¶ turning himself] He may also, without crossing, raise his hand from "Have mercy" to the end.

H2^s—¶ "Then shall the Priest¹ say, Hear what comfortable words. . ."

[1 "also"]

H2^s—¶ 1 "After 2 which" the Priest shall "proceed, saying," "Lift up your hearts. Ans. We lift them. . ."

¶ Then shall the "Priest" turn to the Lords Table, and say, "It is very meet. . ."

¶ Here shall follow the proper Preface, according to the time, if there be any specially appointed: or else immediately shall follow, Therefore with Angels 3 and Archangels. . .

¶ Proper Prefaces. ¶ Upon Christmas day, 4 and seven dayes after. . . 4 ¶ "Upon the feast of 5 Trinity" only. . . 6 without any difference or inequality. Therefore with Angels, &c.

¶ "After" each of "which Prefaces" shall 7 immediately "be sung or said." Therefore with Angels . . . saying. 8 Holy holy, Lord God of hosts, heaven and earth are full of thy Glory. 9 Glory "be" "to thee, O Lord," "most High." Amen.

[1 (For 1548 and 1549 position and use see H2^s n. 4). 2 'the' 3 (Not in full here till 1662). 4 (Text of Prefaces practically unaltered, titles expanded in 1552 like Christmas). 5 'the' 6 In 1549, instead of the note to omit Holy Father, the clause It is very meet. . . was reprinted without these words, and the pref. ended . . . inequality, whom the angels &c. 7 "follow" 8 (New par. till 1662, the sign ¶ being before Holy in 1549 and before therefore in 1552). 9 'Osannah in the highest. Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: Glory to thee, O Lord, in the highest. This the Clerks shall also sing. When the Clerks have done singing, then shall the Priest, or Deacon, turn him to the people, and say, Let us pray for the whole state of Christ's Church. (Pr. for the Ch. transposed in 1552 to H1⁷).]

¶ immediately shall follow . . . shall be sung or said] Cp. § 87. The intention is that the priest alone shall say all the words up to Amen, unless they be sung, when the choir enter at Holy . . .; but the custom has arisen of the people repeating either from Therefore . . ., or, more commonly and according to analogy, from Holy . . . (Modern PEs, without authority, print Amen like the preceding words.) The interpolation of Benedictus qui venit here is unlawful, as "letting" the service.

H2^s—¶ "Then shall the Priest¹ kneel"-ing "down" at the Lords Table "say in the name of all them that shall receive the Communion, this prayer following. We do not presume . . ." 2

[1 'turning him to God's board' (not in 1548) (s.e., immediately after the Comfortable Words) "kneel down and say" 2 (After "drink his blood") 'in these holy mysteries' (also clauses about indwelling and cleansing transposed in 1552).]

H2^s—¶ 1 When 'the Priest, standing' 2 before the Table, hath so ordered the Bread and Wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the Bread before the people, and take the Cup into his hands, he 'shall say' the Prayer of Consecration, 'as followeth.'

3 'Almighty' "God," 'our' "heavenly Father. . . until his coming again; Hear us, O merciful Father, we" most humbly "beseech thee, and" 4 'grant that we receiving' "these thy creatures of bread and wine,"

(a) 'Here the Priest' is to 'take the' 'Pat-ten' into his hands': (b) And here to break the bread: (c) And here to lay his hand upon all the bread. (d) 'Here' he is to 'take the cup into his hand': (e) And here to lay his hand upon every vessel (be it Chalice or Flaggon) in which there is any wine to be consecrated.

¶ according to thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christs holy institution, in remembrance of his death and passion, may be partakers of his most blessed' "body and blood: Who in the same night that he was betrayed 5 (a) took bread, and when he had given thanks, (b) he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat, (c) this is my body which is given for you, do this in remembrance of me. Likewise after Supper (d) he took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them, saying, Drink, ye all of this, for this (e) is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins: Doe this, as oft as ye shall drink it, in remembrance of me." 6 'Amen.'

[1 'Then' (No rubric in 1549 where no break occurs, cp. text under CANON, § 2 55). 2 'up' 3 'O' 4 'with thy holy Spirit and word vouchsafe to bl+ess and sanc+tify these thy gifts, and creatures of bread and wine, that they may be unto us the body and blood of thy most dearly beloved Son Jesus Christ'. "Who. . ." (The Invocation in Am. is conformed to our PB text from 'bread and wine,' and follows the Act of Commemoration, n. 6 below, in better accordance with ancient usage, cp. EUCH. CONSECRATION). 5 No marginal notes in 1552, and in 1549 only (a). . . 'must take the bread. . . and (d). . . 'the Priest shall. . . hands'. 6 'These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the Altar, without any elevation, or showing the Sacrament to the people'. [The Pr. of Oblation followed without break in 1549, but with a full and stately act of commemoration prefixed which is now omitted, though kept by Am. (see CANON, as above)]. Am. adds, Here may be sung an Hymn.]

¶ ordered the Bread and Wine] This will include adjusting the amount to the numbers intimated or observed since the offertory, if non-communicants have withdrawn.

¶ break the bread before the people] This act, which must be done openly, whether the North side or Eastward position is taken, is performed by those adopting the latter alternative with openness, readiness, and decency, by turning half or altogether round, retaining the Paten in the hands. Others raise the Bread and separate the two portions with a distinct gesture. The words should be said gravely and clearly, and the significant actions performed reverently and without hurry. The ceremony of ELEVATION is unlawful, but slight elevations are without authority practised in many chs. at the words, Do this. No bowing or making the SIGN OF THE CROSS has any authority here.

H2^o—¶ 1 "Then shall the" ^a 'Minister' "first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and" then proceed to ^a "deliver" the same to the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons in like manner ^a " (if any be present) ^a and after " that "to the people" also in order, 'in'-to 'their hands,' all ^a meekly 'kneeling.' " And when he delivereth the" ^a 'bread to any one, "he shall say,"

'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee, preserve thy body^a and soul unto everlasting life'. 'Take and eat this in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart by faith with thanksgiving.'

¶ "And the Minister" ^a 'that delivereth the cup' to any one, "shall say,"

'The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was shed for thee, preserve thy¹⁰ body and soul unto everlasting life'. 'Drink this in remembrance that Christ's blood was shed for thee, and be thankful.'

¹² ¶ If the consecrated bread or wine be all spent before all have communicated; the Priest is to consecrate more according to the form before prescribed: Beginning at [¹³ Our Saviour Christ in the same night, &c.] for the blessing of the bread; and at [Likewise after Supper, &c.] for the blessing of the cup.¹⁴

[1 1548 Then shall the Priest rise, the people still reverently kneeling, and the Priest shall deliver the Communion, first to the Ministers, if any be there present, that they may be ready to help the Priest, and after to the other. 2 'Priest' 3 "next deliver it to other Ministers." 4 "that they may" 'be ready to' "help the chief Minister." 5 Am. devoutly kneeling. And sufficient opportunity shall be given to those present to communicate. 6 'sacrament of the body of Christ' (and so 1548). 7 'to every one these words' (1548 adds following). 8, 1548 om. and soul 9 'delivering the sacrament of the blood, and giving every one to drink once and no more' 10, 1548 om. body and 11 'If there be a Deacon, or other Priest, then shall he follow with the Chalice: and as the Priest ministrereth the sacrament of the body (1548 the bread), so shall he (for more expedition) minister the sacrament of the blood (1548 the wine), in form before written [1548 ends]. In the Communion time the Clerks shall sing, is. O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world: have mercy upon us. O Lamb of God. . . : Grant us thy peace. Beginning as soon as the Priest doth receive the HC, and when the communion is ended, then shall the Clerks sing the Post-communion.

(22) Sentences of holy scripture to be said or sung every day one, after the HC, called the post-Communion. 12 1548 (last rubric) Note, that if it doth so chance, that the wine hallowed and consecrate doth not suffice or be enough for them that do take the Communion, the Priest after the first Cup or Chalice be emptied, may go again to the altar, and reverently and decently prepare, and consecrate another, and so the third, or more, likewise beginning at these words, Simili modo postquam coenatum est, and ending at these words, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum and without any levation or lifting up. 13 Am. All glory be to thee, Almighty God, and ending with these words, partakers of his most blessed body and blood. 14 Ir. And when, by reason of numbers, it is inconvenient to address to each Communicant, separately, the words appointed to be said on delivering the Bread and the Cup, the words may, with the consent of the Ordinary, be said once to as many as shall together kneel for receiving the Communion at the Holy Table; provided that the words be said separately to any Communicant so desiring it. (cp. n. 11 above.)

¶ Then shall the Min. first receive] He must receive, and that after only a moderate pause for private devotion, for which altar cards or supplementary books are not lawful. He may stand to administer to himself, and kneel on one or both knees bef. and aft. receiving each element, using the Words as printed; or he may stand or kneel throughout. Agnus Dei or a hymn may be sung by the choir here (cp. § 63) during the Communion.

¶ in order] When communicants are numerous, they should come up and return under unobtrusive direction. Administration may begin at either end (or both at once, if several Mins. are available), but the south was anciently preferred.

¶ into their hands] Not mouths. The plural may only refer to the communicants, but the use of both hands is to be recommended to communicants (see COMMUNION, MANNER OF).

¶ all meekly kneeling], unless, of course, infirmity requires standing or sitting.

¶ to any one, he shall say] The Words should be spoken audibly in a low voice, and not whispered. However many be the communicants, the Words may not be mutilated. To save time, three expedients are in various chs. adopted, none of which would, possibly, in spite of canon 21 ("the Min. shall deliver both the Bread and the Wine to each communicant severally"), be pronounced illegal: (1) administering to two at once (two chalices being used, and the words being said once only, or less preferably with repetition of Take and eat this; Drink this, on the analogy of Confirm. practice); (2) the first part of the words is said to a faithful, and the second singly; (3) the entire formula is said to a faithful, the administration taking place in silence (a plan which emphasises the mutual fellowship, but impairs the personal application).

H3¹—¶ When all have communicated, the Minister shall return to the Lord's Table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated Elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth.

23. HC III.
Post-Communion.

¶ reverently place] Here and elsewhere care and order, in disposing the vessels and their coverings, and an avoidance of any jerky or slovenly movements, are real helps to outward dignity and inward recollection. The mutual relations of the priest and assistant min. or mins. should be carefully settled (and, if necessary, rehearsed) beforehand.

H3²—¶ "Then shall the Priest say the Lords Prayer, the people repeating after him every Petition." ¹ 'Our Father. . . . And lead us not into temptation: 'But deliver us from evil. For thine. . . ever. Amen.'

[1 (In 1549 the Lord's Pr. immediately followed the Pr. of Oblation and preceded the Confession.)

'Let us Pray. As our Saviour Christ hath commanded and taught us, we are bold to say'. 2 'The Answer'.]

|| Then shall the Priest by custom standing as before.

H3²—¶ 'After shall be said, as followeth.'
1 "O Lord and heavenly Father. . ."

[1 (In 1549 this immediately followed the Pr. of Consecration. For the opening, now altered, see CANON, § 2 55, cp. Am.)]

H3¹—¶ 'Or this.' "Almighty and ever-living God, we most heartily thank thee, for that thou" 2 "dost vouchsafe" "to feed us. . ."

[1 'Then the Priest shall give thanks to God, in the name of all them that have communicated, turning him first to the people, and saying, The Lord. . . Ans. And with. . . Let us Pray'. 2 'hast vouchsafed' (past tenses throughout).]

|| Or this] The second thanksgiving is appropriate on Saints' days, at special commemorations of the faithful departed, and with the sick (cp. First PB, ¶ 7 n. 9).

H3³—¶ "Then" 1 "shall be said or sung"; "Glory be to God on high, 2 and in earth. . ."

¶ "Then the Priest" 4 ("or Bishop if he be present") "shall let them depart with this blessing. The peace of God. . . Christ our Lord 6 : And the blessing . . . with you always. 'Amen.'

[1 (In 1549 this came at the beginning, see above H1³ n. 7. Note that the Priest begins, and the Clerks sing the rest.) 2 'The Clerks'. 3 (Perhaps to compensate for the triple Agnus no longer prescribed an addition was made in 1552 of the words, 'Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us.'). 4 'turning him to the people' 5 Am. the 6 (1548 ends here). 7 'Then' ('To the which') "the people shall answer."]

|| Then shall be said or sung] This is intended to be said by the Priest alone, or sung by the choir. This Amen is also printed wrongly in recent PBs. By custom, the people now join in (cp. § 88). The practice, once general, of standing for this hymn has much to recommend it.

|| Let them depart] The additional ceremony of the ABSOLUTION (H5⁴) has been pronounced lawful at this point in the ch., or it may be carried out in the vestry. A hymn or Nunc Dimittis is often sung here.

H4¹—¶ "Collects 2 to be said after the Offertory, when there is no Communion, every such day one," 3 "or more; and the same may be said also, as often as occasion shall serve, after the Collects either of Morning or Evening Prayer, Communion, or Litany, by 4 the discretion of the Minister."

[1 'Where there are no clerks, there the Priest shall say all things appointed here for them to sing. When the HC is celebrate on the work day, or in private houses: Then may be omitted, Gloria in excelsis, the Creed, the Homily, and the Exh. beginning Dearly beloved &c.' 2 Am. that may be said after the Collects either of M or EP or Communion, at]

H4²—"Assist us mercifully, O Lord, in. . ."

H4³—"O Alm. Lord, and everlasting God. . ."

H4⁴—"Grant, we beseech thee, Alm. God. . ."

H4⁵—"Prevent us, O Lord in. . ."

H4⁶—"Almighty God, the fountain of all. . ."

[1 'For Rain' (see F10⁴). 'For Fair weather' (see F11).]

|| Collects] The wide discretion of the Min. here given is frequently overlooked. It gives an additional means of variation, and of marking a special intention.

H5¹—¶ 1 'Upon the' Sundaies and other 'holy days (2 if there be no 3 Communion) shall be said all that is appointed at the Communion, until the end of 4 the general Prayer (For the whole state of Christs Church militant here in earth) together with one or more of these Collects last before rehearsed,' 5 concluding with the Blessing.

[1 'Upon Wednesdays and Fridays, the English Litany shall be said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by the king's majesty's Injunctions: or as is or shall be otherwise appointed by his highness. And though there be none to communicate with the Priest, yet these days (after the Litany ended) the Priest shall put upon him a plain albe or surplice, with a cope, and say all things at the altar (appointed to be said at the celebration of the Lord's Supper) until after the offertory. And then shall add one or two of the Collects aforewritten, as occasion shall serve, by his discretion. And then turning him to the people shall let them depart with the accustomed blessing. And the same order shall be used all other days, whensoever the people be customably assembled to pray in the church, and none disposed to communicate with the Priest'. 2 Am. though there be no Sermon or 3 'the Homily concluding with' Am. the Gospel (om. to rehearsed). 4 'as occasion shall serve' 5 'Likewise in Chapels annexed, and all other places, there shall be no celebration of the Lord's Supper, except there be some to communicate with the Priest. And in such chapels annexed where the people hath not been accustomed to pay any holy bread, there they must either make some charitable provision for the bearing of the charges of the Communion, or else (for receiving of the same) resort to their parish church.')

|| For this rule, see ANTE-COMMUNION.

H5²—¶ 1 'And there shall be no celebration of the Lords Supper, except there be a 2 convenient 'number to communicate with the Priest, according to his discretion.'

[1 Ir. om. (Am. om. H5^{2.5} 7.9). 2 'good' (cp. H5¹ n. 5).]

|| a convenient number] The obvious intention, that in all the larger parishes there should be more than the "three" of H5², has been disregarded, the terms not being precise.

H5³—¶ And 1 if there be not above twenty persons in the Parish of discretion to receive the Communion; yet 2 there shall be no Communion, except 3 four, or three at the least, 4 communicate with the Priest.

[1 Ir. om. 2 Ir. there be three, or two at the least, of the people to]

H5⁴—¶ 1 'And in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches and Colledges, where there are many Priests and Deacons, they shall all receive the Communion with the Priest every Sunday at the least, except they have a reasonable cause to the contrary.' 2

[1 (Cp. viii below, and RITUAL LAW, § 29b.) 2 Ir. adds, On occasions sanctioned by the Ordinary, this Office may begin with the Coll., Ep., and Gospel.]

|| Canon 24 makes the minimum four times a year.

H5⁵—¶ 1 'And to take away' 2 all occasion of dissension, and 'superstition, which any Person hath or might have concerning the Bread and Wine, it shall suffice that the Bread be such as is usual to be eaten²; but the best and purest Wheat Bread that conveniently may be gotten.'

[1 1548. Note, that the Bread that shall be consecrated shall be such as heretofore hath been accustomed. And every of the said consecrated Breads shall be broken in two pieces, at the least, or more by the discretion of the Minister and so distributed. (The rest as 1549 below.) 'For avoiding all matters and occasion of dissension, it is meet that the bread prepared for the Communion be made, through this realm, after one sort and fashion; that is to say unleavened, and round, as it was afore, but without all manner of print, and something more larger and thicker than it was, so that it may be aptly divided in divers pieces: and every one shall be divided in two pieces, at the least, or more by the discretion of the minister, and so distributed. And men must not think less to be received in part, than in the whole, but in each of them the whole body of our Saviour Jesus Christ'. 2 'the' 3 'at the table with other meats']

¶ if it shall suffice It is often stated as obvious that this only tolerates common bread as an alternative to unleavened bread; but R. P. Blakeney points out in his ed. of the PB., 1870, p. 460, (1) that canon 20 requires "fine white bread"; (2) that "it is sufficient" in canon 25 admits no alternative and (3) that the insertion in 1662 of "occasion of dissension" in the rubric (cp. 1549, when only one sort was allowed) requires common bread. And so the courts have decided (Ritual Law, Table I, 25).

H56—¶ 'And if any of the¹ Bread and Wine remain'² unconsecrated, 'the Curate shall have it to his own use': but if any remain of that which was consecrated, it shall not be carried out of the Church, but the³ Priest and such other of the Communicants as he shall then call unto him, shall immediately after the Blessing, reverently eat and drink the same.

[1 Am. consecrated 2 Am. after the Communion (om. to consecrated) 3 Am. Min. and other communicants shall]

¶ immediately after the Blessing These words have been authoritatively interpreted as meaning that RESERVATION for any purpose is unlawful (see also ABSOLUTIONS).

H57—¶ 'The Bread and Wine for the Communion shall be provided by the Curate and the Church-wardens, at the charges of the Parish.'²

[1 'And forasmuch as the Pastors and Curates within this realm shall continually find at their costs and charges in their cures sufficient bread and wine for the holy Communion (as oft as their Parishioners shall be disposed for their spiritual comfort to receive the same) it is therefore ordered that in recompense of such costs and charges, the Parishioners of every Parish shall offer every Sunday, at the time of the Offertory, the just valour and price of the holy loaf (with all such money and other things as were wont to be offered with the same) to the use of their Pastors and Curates, and that in such order and course, as they were wont to find and pay the said holy loaf'. 2 'and the Parish shall be discharged of such sums of money, or other duties, which hitherto they have paid for the same, by order of their houses every Sunday'. 3 'Also that the receiving of the Sacrament of the blessed body and blood of Christ, may be most agreeable to the institution thereof, and to the usage of the primitive Church: In all Cathedral and Collegiate churches, there shall always some communicate with the Priest that ministereth. And that the same may be also observed every where abroad in the country: Some one at the least of that house in every parish, to whom by course, after the ordinance herein made, it appertaineth to offer for the charges of the Communion, or some other whom they shall provide to offer for them, shall receive the holy Communion with the priest: the which may be the better done, for that they know before, when their course cometh, and may therefore dispose themselves to the worthy receiving of the Sacrament. And with him or them who doth so offer the charges of the Communion, all other, who be then Godly disposed thereunto, shall likewise receive the Communion. And by this means the Minister having always some to communicate with him, may accordingly solemnise so high and holy mysteries, with all the suffrages and due order appointed for the same. And the Priest on the week day shall forbear to celebrate the Communion, except he have some that will communicate with him'.]

H58—¶ 'And note, that every Parishioner shall communicate at the least three times in the year, of which Easter to be one.'² And yearly at Easter every Parishioner shall reckon with the Parson, Vicar, or Curate; or his or their Deputy, or Deputies, and pay to them or him all Ecclesiastical duties, accustomedly due, then and at that time to be paid.'³

[1 'Furthermore, every man and woman to be bound to hear and be at the divine service, in the Parish church where they be resident, and there with devout prayer, or Godly silence and meditation, to occupy themselves. There to pay their duties, to communicate once in the year at the least, and there to receive and take all other Sacraments and rites, in this book appointed. And whosoever willingly, upon no just cause, doth absent themselves, or doth ungodly in the Parish church occupy themselves: upon proof thereof, by the Ecclesiastical laws of the Realm, to be excommunicate, or suffer other punishment, as shall to the Ecclesiastical judge (according to his discretion) seem convenient'. 2 'and shall also receive the Sacraments and other rites, according to the order in this book appointed'. 3 Ir. All Ministers shall exhort their people to communicate frequently. And every Parishioner shall from time to time be exhorted to contribute regularly of his substance to the maintenance of the worship of God, according as God shall prosper him. 4 'And although it be read in ancient writers, that the people, many years past, received at the Priest's hands the Sacrament of the body of Christ in their own hands, and no commandment of Christ to the contrary: Yet forasmuch as they many times conveyed the same secretly away, kept it with them, and diversely abused it to superstition and wickedness: lest any such thing hereafter should be attempted, and that an uniformity might be used throughout the whole Realm, it is thought convenient the people commonly receive the Sacrament of Christ's body in their mouths, at the Priest's hand'.]

¶ three times in the year This rule also establishes an obligation (cp. canon 21) that the Min. shall administer H.C. "so often and at such times" as shall give due opportunity.

¶ yearly at Easter Cp. EASTER OFFERINGS.

H59—¶ After the Divine Service ended, the money given at the Offertory shall be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses, as the Minister and Church-wardens shall think fit. Wherein if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint.

¶ if they disagree] One dissident can, therefore, force a reference to the Ordinary. Other collections are as the incumbent may appoint, but he will naturally consult wardens and others.

I—"The Ministration of" 'PUBLICK' "BAPTISM" OF INFANTS "to be used in the Church."

I¹—¶ "The people are to be admonished, that it is most convenient that Baptism should not be administered but upon Sundays and other holy-days,² when the most number of people come together: as well for that the Congregation there present may testify the receiving of them that be newly baptised into the number of Christs Church; as also because in the Baptism of Infants, every man present may be put in remembrance of his own profession made to God in his Baptism. For which cause also it is expedient that Baptism be ministered in the "vulgar" tongue. Nevertheless (if necessity so require) children "may be baptised upon any other day.

[1 "It appeareth by ancient writers, that the Sac. of Bapt. in the old time was not commonly ministered but at two times in the year, at Easter and Whitsuntide, at which times it was openly ministered in the presence of all the congregation: Which custom (now being grown out of use) although it cannot for many considerations be well restored again, yet it is thought good to follow the same as near as conveniently may be: Wherefore the people" 2 Am. adds or Prayer-days and om. to vulgar tongue. 3 "English" 4 "ought" ("may") "at all times" 'to' "be baptised" 'either at the Church or else' "at home."]

¶ The people kneel, the Priest stands, as implied by I3¹, J2².

I²—¶ "Almighty and immortal God, the aid of. . ."

[1 Am. Or this. 2 'Then let the Priest looking upon the children, say, I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou come out, and depart from these infants, whom our Lord Jesus Christ hath vouchsafed to call to his holy Baptism, to be made members of his body, and of his holy congregation. Therefore, thou cursed spirit, remember thy sentence, remember thy judgment, remember the day to be at hand wherein thou shalt burn in fire everlasting, prepared for thee and thy Angels. And presume not hereafter to exercise any tyranny toward these infants, whom Christ hath bought with his precious blood, and by this his holy Baptism calleth to be of his flock'.]

I³—¶ "Then 'shall" the people stand up, and "the Priest" shall "say," "Hear" "the words of" "the Gospel, written by Saint Mark," "in the tenth chapter, at the thirteenth verse. S. Mark x. 13⁴.

[1 Am. The Min. shall say as followeth, or else shall pass immediately to the questions addressed to the Sponsors. But Note, that in every church the intermediate parts of the service shall be used, once at least in every month (if there be a baptism), for the better instructing of the people in the grounds of Infant Baptism. 2¹ The Lord be . . . The People. And with. . . . The Minister. 3¹ now 4 (From Great Bible till 1662.)

|| Custom does not sanction the use of the doxologies bef. and aft., but analogy might justify it.

I3¹—¶ "After the Gospel is read, the Minister shall make this brief exhortation upon the words of the Gospel. Beloved, ye hear in this Gospel the words. . ."¹

[1¹ and say the prayer which the Lord himself taught. And in declaration of our faith, let us also recite the articles contained in our Creed. Here the Minister, with the Godfathers, Godmothers, and people present, shall say, ¶ Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, &c. And then shall say openly, I believe in God the Father Almighty, &c. The Priest shall add also this prayer.]

I3²—¶ Almighty and everlasting God, heavenly . . ."¹

[1¹ Then let the Priest take one of the children by the right hand, the other being brought after him. And coming into the church toward the font, say, The Lord vouchsafe to receive you into his holy household, and to keep and govern you always in the same, that you may have everlasting life. Amen.]

|| The people, by a not unedifying custom, usually join in, though not required or intended to do so. cp. § 88.

I4¹—¶ "Then¹ shall the Priest speak unto the Godfathers and Godmothers on this wise. Dearly "beloved," "ye have brought this child. . ."²

[1¹ standing at the font the Priest shall 2¹ Well beloved friends 3¹ "forsake" for renounce. Am. adds, The Min. shall then demand of the sponsors as followeth, the questions being considered as addressed to them severally, and the Answers to be made accordingly.

|| Here and elsewhere what is said to the sponsors should be said in a lower tone, but clearly, and so as to be audible by the people.

|| Ans.] The Priest should pause till each sponsor has answered, and should provide that all have PBs or Office books open at the right place.

I4²—¶ I demand therefore, "Dost thou" in the name of this child renounce² "the devil and all his works," the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same,"³ and "the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow nor be led by them?" Ans. I¹ renounce 2¹ "them" 3¹ "all."

[1¹ *Then shall the Priest demand of the "child (which shall be first baptised)" ["Godfathers and Godmothers"] "these questions following": "first naming the child, and saying" 2¹ "forsake" 3¹ Ans. I forsake them. Min. Dost thou forsake [twice] 4¹ Am. sinful. 5¹ Am. adds, and, by God's help, will endeavour not to follow nor be led by them.]*

I4³—¶ Min. Dost thou believe¹ in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth?" 2¹ "And" "in Jesus Christ his only begotten. . . quick and the dead?" 3¹ "And" "dost thou believe in the holy Ghost. . . the resurrection of the flesh; and everlasting life after death?" Ans. 4¹ "All this" "I" "steadfastly" "believe."

Min. Dost thou believe¹ 3¹ Dost thou believe this? Ans. I believe. 4¹ Am. I do.

I4⁴—¶ Min. Wilt thou be baptised?" "In this faith?" Ans. 2¹ That is my desire.

[1¹ Min. What dost thou desire? Ans. Baptism. 2¹ I will.]

I4⁵—¶ Min. Wilt thou then obediently keep Gods holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the dayes of thy life? Ans. I will.

[1¹ Am. adds, By God's help.]

I5¹—¶ "Then shall the¹ Priest say," 2¹ O Merciful God, grant that the old Adam. . . Grant that all carnal affections. . . Grant that he may have power. . . Grant that whosoever. . .

[1¹ Am. Min. 2 (4 out of 8 prs. used in 1549 PB at benediction of the Font, see below I19 n. 6, and BAPTISMAL OFFICES.)]

|| All remain standing for these prayers.

I5²—¶ Almighty everlasting God. . . . Regard, we beseech thee, the supplications of thy congregation"; sanctify this water to the mystical washing away of sin: "and grant that" 2¹ this child now to be "baptised" therein, "may receive. . ."

[1¹ (Last pr. at benediction of the Font in 1549 see I19). 2¹ "all thy servants which shall be baptised in this water"]

|| sanctify this water] To make the SIGN of the Cross in or over the water will, by the Lincoln Judgment, constitute an additional, and illegal, ceremony; but the outstretched hand is unobjectionable, as merely indicative and subsidiary to the rite.

I6¹—¶ "Then the¹ Priest shall take the child into his hands, and 2¹ shall say to the Godfathers and Godmothers, Name this child.

[1¹ Am. Min. 2 "ask the Name"]

|| shall take the child] its head being moved from the sponsor's right, to his left, arm. He holds each child till after I6⁴. A big child may be treated as an adult, j6¹.

I6²—¶ And "then "naming it" after them (1 if they shall certify him that the child may well endure it) "he shall dip it in the water" discreetly⁴ and warily, saying. N. I baptise thee. . .

[1¹ Am. om. 2 Ir. desire it, and he shall be certified 3¹ thrice. First dipping the right side: second, the left side: the third time dipping the face toward the font: "so it be discreetly and warily done." 4¹ Am. or shall pour water upon it, 5 Ir. otherwise it shall suffice to pour water upon it, saying always.]

|| dip it] If understood as "immerse" (cp. I6⁴, n. 2 Am.), a loose woollen dress is needed, and the child may be dried and dressed during a hymn; but if taken as obeyed by dipping the head, cap and cloak merely need, as usual, to be removed.

I6³—¶ But if they certify, that 1¹ "the child is weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it, saying the foresaid words, N. I baptise thee. . ."

sign whereby thou art admonished, so long as thou livest, to give thyself to innocency of living, that, after this transitory life, thou mayest be partaker of the life everlasting. Amen. 3 Then the Priest shall anoint the infant upon the head, saying, Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath regenerate thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and hath given unto thee remission of all thy sins : he vouchsafe to anoint thee with the unction of his Holy Spirit, and bring thee to the inheritance of everlasting life. Amen. When there are many to be baptised, this order of demanding, baptising, putting on the Chrisom, and anointing, shall be used severally with every child : those that be first baptised departing from the font, and remaining in some convenient place within the Church until all be baptised. At the last end, the Priest, calling the Godfathers and Godmothers together, shall say this short Exhortation following :

¶ if they certify] The dress of the child usually furnishes a virtual certificate.

¶ Trine immersion is no longer ordered, but three acts of pouring, as the three Persons are named, are customary in many chs. The water must in any case be poured, not sprinkled merely. A vessel, not too shallow, may be conveniently used, but is not ordered. A napkin may be at hand to wipe the head of the child.

I6—¶ Then the Priest shall say, 'We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock,† and do sign him. . . .' Here the Priest shall make a cross upon the child's forehead.

†1 'make a cross upon the child's forehead, saying' (cp. I2³ n.1). 2 Am. adds, If those who present the infant shall desire the sign of the cross to be omitted, although the Ch. knoweth no worthy cause of scruple concerning the same, yet, in that case, the Min. may omit that part of the above which followeth the Immersion, or the pouring of water on the Infant.]

¶ shall say] Solemnly, and preferably by heart. In any case, the book should be so placed, or held by Verger or Clerk, that it is not injured by the water.

¶ shall make a cross] The old rule was to use the thumb without water. (The child is now usually given back at this point, ct. 16³ n. 2.)

I7—¶ Then shall the Priest say, 'Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that' this child is 'regenerate. . . .'

[1 Am. Minister. 2 'these children are' (and so on).]

I7²—¶ Then shall be said, all kneeling, 'Our Father which art in heaven' ; 'Hallowed. . . . But deliver us from evil. Amen.

[1 '&c.']

¶ all kneeling] The Priest is included, if we may judge from I8¹, "all standing up," ct. 13¹. "Then shall the people stand up."

I7³—¶ Then shall the Priest say, We yield thee hearty thanks. . . .'

[1 Am. Minister.]

I8—¶ Then all standing up, "the Priest" shall say "to "the Godfathers and Godmothers" this exhortation following. Forasmuch as' this child hath 'promised. . . .'

[1 "At the last end the Priest, calling the Godfathers. . . . together shall say" 2 "these children have"

I8²—¶ Then shall he adde and say, Ye are to take care that this child be brought to the Bishop. . . .'

[1 "The Min. shall command that" 'the chrisoms be brought to the Ch. and delivered to the Priests

after the accustomed manner, at the purification of the mother of every child ; and that "the children be brought to the Bp." (the rest in substance as the Exh.) and so let the congregation depart in the name of the Lord.' 2 ¶ Note, that if the number of children to be baptised, and multitude of people present, be so great that they cannot conveniently stand at the church door ; then let them stand within the church, in some convenient place, nigh unto the church door ; and there all things be said and done, appointed to be said and done at the church door'.]

¶ If during EP, Nunc Dimittis may be sung during return to chancel, and the register filled up immediately after service. If otherwise, the service may be closed with a Coll. (H4³ or 5), and a commendatory Benediction (N5³ . . . we commend this child ; the Lord bless him . . .). A parent or sponsor should attend the registration forthwith in the vestry, and the date of birth may with advantage also be entered. Commemorative or explanatory cards or papers may often with advantage be given away, with a word of earnest and sympathetic counsel. A subsequent visit may also be desirable.

IO¹—It is certain by Gods word, that children which are baptised, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.

IO²—To take away all scruple concerning the use of the sign of the Cross in Baptism ; the true Explication thereof, and the just reasons for the retaining of it may be seen in the 30th Canon, first published in the year 1604.

IO³—The Ministration of "PRIVATE BAPTISM of Children in Houses."

1 "Of them that be baptised in Private Houses in time of necessity."

IO¹—¶ "The Curates" of every Parish "shall often admonish the people, that they deferre not the Baptism of" their children "longer than the" first or second "Sunday next after" their birth, "or other holy-day" falling between, "unless upon a great and reasonable cause, to be approved by the Curate."

[1 "Pastors and" 2 "infants any longer than the Sunday or other holy-day next after the child be born, unless" 3 1r. third or fourth]

¶ a great and reasonable cause] The presence of the mother is now commonly regarded as such, contrary to the older practice witnessed by this rubric and M16 n. 2 (the chrisom to be delivered at the churching, which now commonly takes place before christening).

IO²—¶ "And also they shall warn them, that without" like "great cause and necessity they" procure not their "children" to be "baptise'd" "at home in their houses." But "when need shall compel them so to do, then" Baptism shall be administered "on this fashion."

[1 "baptise not children" 2 "and when great" 3 "that then they minister it"]

IO³—¶ "First let" the Minister of the Parish (or in his absence, any other lawful Minister that can be procured) with "them that are present call upon God, and say the Lords Prayer," and so many of the Collects appointed to be said before in the Form of Publick Baptism, as the time and present exigence will suffer.

[1 "for his grace" 2 "if the time will suffer" 3 1r. other prs.

¶ any other lawful Min.] A Deacon, or, in extreme necessity, a lay person of either sex (LAY BAPTISM), may baptise. Midwives and nurses may be instructed how to act. Under I19 the matter and form only are noted as "essential parts." The Order may be: Lord's Pr., I2⁴, I4¹⁻⁶ (the last in any case), I11¹⁻², conclusion as noted under I8².

I11¹—¶ And then, ¹ the child "being named by some one that is present, the minister shall "pour water upon" it, "saying these words; N. I baptise thee. . ."

¹ "one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him"

¶ The particulars should be written down on the spot and entered in the register, the same day if possible; and the parents should be instructed to bring the child to be received as next ordered, with sponsors as in other cases.

I11²—¶ Then ¹ all kneeling down, the Minister shall give thanks unto God, and say, We yield thee hearty thanks. . . (as I7²).

[1 Am. om. all kneeling down]

I12¹—¶ "And let them not doubt, but that the child so baptised is lawfully and sufficiently baptised, and ought not to be baptised again.¹ Yet nevertheless, if the child which is after this sort Baptised, do afterward live, it is expedient that it be brought into the Church, to the intent that" ² if the Minister of the same Parish did himself Baptise that Child, the Congregation may be certified of the true form of Baptism, by him privately before used³: In which case he shall say thus, *I certify you, that according to the due and prescribed order of the Church, at such a time, and at such a place, before divers witnesses I baptised this child.*⁴

[1 "in the Ch. But yet" ² (see I12² n. 2 for continuation of older form. The present was in the main adopted in 1604). 3 1604 ends. 4 Am. who is now by Bapt. incorporated into the Christian Ch.: for our Lord Jesus Christ. . . . (as I12²).]

I12²—¶ But if the child were baptised by any other lawful Minister; then the Minister ¹ of the Parish where the child was born or christened, shall ² "examine and try whether ³ the child be lawfully baptised, or no." In which case, ⁴ "if those that bring any child to the Church, do answer that" the same child ⁵ "is already baptised, then shall the" ⁶ Minister "examine them further," saying, "By whom⁷ was" this child "baptised? Who was present when" this "child was baptised?"" ⁸ Because some things essential to this sacrament may happen to be omitted through fear or haste, in such times of extremity; therefore I demand further of you, "With¹⁰ what matter" ¹¹ was this "child" baptised? "With what words" was "this child "baptised?""¹²

[1 Ir. who receiveth the child 2 (contd. from I12¹ n. 2) "to the intent that the Priest may" 3 Am. the same hath been lawfully done (om. to I12²) 4 "And" 5 "he" 6 "Priest" 7 "the child was" 8 "the" 9 "whether they called upon God for grace and succour in that necessity," 10 "what thing or" 11 "they did baptise the" 12 "whether they think the child to be lawfully and perfectly baptised?"]

I12³—¶ "And if the Minister shall" find ¹ by the answers of such as bring the child, that all things were done as they ought to be; then shall not he christen the child again, but shall receive him as one of the flock of true Christian people, saying thus, I Certifie you, that in this case² all is well done, and according unto due order, concerning the baptising of this child;³ who being born in original sin, and in the wrath of God, is now by the laver of Regeneration in Baptism received into the number of the children of God, and heirs of everlasting life: For our Lord Jesus Christ doth not deny his grace and mercy unto such infants, but most lovingly doth call them unto him, as the holy Gospel doth witness to our comfort⁴ on this wise.

[1 "prove" ² "ye have done well" 3 (Am. as I12¹ n. 4).

I13¹—¶ S. Mark 10 13. They brought young children to Christ. . .

[1 Am. Hear the words. . . (as I3¹).]

I13²—¶ "After the Gospel is read, the Minister shall make this brief exhortation upon the words of the Gospel. Beloved, ye hear in this Gospel. . . and say the Prayer which the Lord himself taught"¹ us. "Our Father which art in heaven; Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come."² Thy. . . .

[1 "and in declaration of our faith, let us also recite the arts. contained in our Creed. Here the Min. with Godfathers. . . shall say, ² "&c." Ir. transfers Lord's Pr. to follow I17¹, cp. I7².]

I13³—¶ Almighty and everlasting God, heavenly . . .

I14¹—¶ "Then shall ¹ the Priest demand the Name of the child, which being by the Godfathers and Godmothers pronounced, the Minister shall say.²

¹ they say the Creed, and then the Priest shall demand." 2 I14²⁻⁴ = I4¹, ³, ⁵ (slight variations in 1552).

¶ Then shall the Priest demand the name . . .] This direction, through the rubrics being in small type, is liable to be neglected.

I16¹—¶ ¹ Then the Priest shall say, We receive this child. . .

I17¹—¶ Then shall the Priest say, *Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren. . .*¹

[1 Ir. transfers Lord's Pr. to this place, as I7².]

¶ It is customary and seemly for the Priest to take the child into his arms, but he must be very careful not by inadvertence to re-baptise it, if the service be combined as provided by I19 n. 5.

I17²—¶ ¹ Then shall the Priest say, We yield thee most hearty thanks. . .

[1 "Let us Pray, Almighty and everlasting God, heavenly Father, we give thee humble thanks. . . (as I3²).]

I18¹—¶ "Then" all standing up, "the Minister shall make this exhortation to the Godfathers and Godmothers. Forasmuch as this child. . ."¹

[1 Am. and Ir. add here I8².

I19¹—¶ "But if they which bring the infant¹ to the Church do make" such ² "uncertain answers" to the Priest's questions," as that it cannot appear that the child was baptised with water, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost (which are essential parts of Baptism) ³ " then let the Priest baptise " 'it in the form before appointed for Publick Baptism of infants; " saving that at the dipping of the child in the Font, he shall use this form of words. If thou art not already baptised, N. I baptise thee In the Name. . . . ³ ⁴

[1 " infants " 2 " an uncertain answer " 3 " and say that they cannot tell what they thought, did, or said, in that great fear and trouble of mind (as oftentimes it changeth) " 4 " him in form above, written concerning Publick Bapt." 5 Am. adds, If infant Bapt., and the receiving of infants baptised in private, are to be at the same time, the Min. may make the Questions to the Sponsors, and the succeeding Prs., serve for both. And again, after the Immersion, or the pouring of water, and the receiving into the Ch., the Min. may use the remainder of the service for both. Ir. If a child that has been already baptised be brought to the Ch. at the same time with a child that is to be baptised, the Min., having inquired concerning the sufficiency of the Bapt., and having certified the same, shall read all that is appointed for the Public Baptism of Infants until he have baptised and signed the child that has not been baptised; and he shall then call upon the Godfathers and Godmothers of the Child that has been already baptised to make answer in his behalf, as here described, save that he shall not again recite the Apostles' Creed, but say, Dost thou believe all the Arts. of the Christian Faith as set forth in the Apostles' Creed? The Min., having then signed the Child according to the form appointed above, shall proceed with the remainder of the Order for Publick Bapt. of Infants, beginning with the words, Seeing now, dearly beloved, &c. . . . 6 (In 1549 a Form for Benediction of the Font followed:)

The water in the font shall be changed every month once at least, and afore any child be baptised in the water so changed, the Priest shall say at the font these prayers following.

'O most merciful God our Saviour Jesu Christ, who hast ordained the element of water for the regeneration of thy faithful people, upon whom, being baptised in the river of Jordan, the Holy Ghost came down in likeness of a dove: Send down, we beseech thee, the same thy Holy Spirit to assist us, and to be present at this our invocation of thy holy name: Sanctify + this fountain of baptism, thou that art the sanctifier of all things, that by the power of thy word all those that shall be baptised therein may be spiritually regenerated, and made the children of everlasting adoption. Amen.'

"O merciful God, grant that the old Adam, in "them that shall be baptised in this fountain", "may be so buried, that the new man may be raised up again. Amen."

"Grant that all carnal affections may die in them; and that all things, belonging to the Spirit, may live and grow in them. Amen."

"Grant " to all them which at this fountain forsake the devil and all his works: "that they may have power and strength to have victory and to triumph against "him", "the world, and the flesh. Amen."

'Whosoever shall confess thee, O Lord: recognise him also in thy kingdom. Amen'.

'Grant that all sin and vice here may be so extinct: that they never have power to reign in thy servants. Amen'.

'Grant that whosoever here shall begin to be of thy flock: may evermore continue in the same. Amen'.

'Grant that all they which for thy sake in this life do deny and forsake themselves: may win and purchase thee, O Lord, which art everlasting treasure. Amen'.

"Grant that whosoever is here dedicated to thee by our office and ministry: may also be endued with heavenly virtues, and everlastingly rewarded through thy mercy, O blessed Lord God, who dost live and govern all things world without end. Amen."

'The Lord be with you.

Answer. And with thy spirit'.

"Almighty everliving God, whose most dearly beloved Son. . . ." (see I³ and n. 2 there).]

J—¹ The Ministration of BAPTISM to SUCH AS ARE OF RIPER YEARS, and able to answer for themselves.

[1 (Sections in I and J which correspond have the same numbering. The whole service was added 1662.)]

[Riper years] Not necessarily adults, but children old enough to be presented without delay for Confirmation (cp. J9¹).

J1¹—¶ When any such persons as are of riper years are to be baptised, timely notice shall be given to the ¹ Bishop, or whom he shall appoint for that purpose, a week before at the least, by the Parents, or some other discreet persons¹; that so due care may be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian Religion; and that they may be exhorted to prepare themselves with prayers and fasting for the receiving of this holy Sacrament.

[1 Am. Minister (om.—persons)]

[notice . . . to the Bp., and whom he shall appoint] The friends are to give the notice, and in most dioceses the incumbent is recognised tacitly as the person appointed by the Bp. to receive it.

[a week before at the least] Except in an emergency, a much longer time is usually desirable (1) for the examination as to knowledge, and (2) for the guided self-preparation of heart and will.

J1²—¶ And if they shall be found fit, then the Godfathers and Godmothers (the people being assembled upon the Sunday or Holy-day appointed) shall be ready to present them at the Font immediately after the second Lesson, either at Morning or Evening Prayer, as the ² Curate in his discretion shall think fit.

[1 Am. or Prayer-day 2 Am. Minister]

[found fit] The Bp. (or his deputy, the incumbent) has a judicial, not an arbitrary, discretion.

[Godparents are required as witnesses.]

[Sunday or Holy-day] No option is given; but the rule is not always kept, and Wed. EP, with none but earnest people present, would appear a fit time. Shyness will be forgotten if it be shown that "the people being assembled" will pray for the baptised, and be edified by their profession and sacramental incorporation into the Church.

J2¹—¶ And standing there, the Priest shall ¹ ask whether any of the persons here presented be baptised or no: If they shall answer, No: then shall the ² Priest say thus,

[1 Am. as I2¹. 2 Am. Min. (the People all standing until the Lord's Pr.) proceed as followeth.

[The Priest] Not a Deacon in this case.

J2²—Dearly beloved; Forasmuch as all men. . . .

J2³—¶ Then ¹shall the Priest say, Let us pray. ²(¶ And here all the Congregation shall kneel.) ³*Alm. and ev. God, who of thy great mercy. . . . (as I2³, but sanctify [the element of ²] water).*

[1. Ir. the people kneeling, the Priest shall say. 2 Am. and Ir. om. (see above). 3 Am. om. addition.]

¶ all the Congregation shall kneel Not the Priest.

J2⁴—Alm. and im. God, the aid. . . . (as I2⁴ but [and] as thou hast promised; Am. and Ir. om. and).

J3¹—¶ Then ¹shall the people stand up, and the Priest shall say, Hear the words of the Gospel. . . . S. John 3, 1. There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus. . . .

[1 Am. the Min. shall say.]

J3²—¶ After which he shall say this exhortation following. Beloved, ye hear in this Gospel the express words. . . . let us. . . . give thanks to him and say, Alm. and ev. God, heavenly Father. . . .

[1 Ir. (to be said by the Min. and People).]

¶ and say For the custom of joint recitation, cp. I3².

J4¹—¶ Then the ¹Priest shall speak to the persons to be baptised on this wise. Well-beloved, who are come hither. . . .

[1 Am. Minister.]

J4²—¶ ¹Then shall the Priest demand of each of the persons to be baptised severally these questions following. Question. Dost thou renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow, nor be led by them? Ans. *I renounce them all.*²

[1 (Am. modifies as I4¹ n. 3). 2 Am. sinful. 3 (Am. adds as I4² n. 5).]

J4³—Question. Dost thou believe³ in God. . . . Ans. All this I steadfastly believe.

[1 Am. Minister. 2 (Am. as I4³ n. 1). 3 Am. I do.]

J4⁴—Question. Wilt thou be baptised in this faith? Ans. That is my desire.

J4⁵—Question.—Wilt thou then obediently keep. . . . Ans. I will¹ endeavour so to do, God being my helper.

[1 Am. by God's help (Ends).]

[1 Am. Minister.]

J6¹—¶ Then shall the Priest take each person to be baptised by the right hand, and placing him conveniently by the Font, according to his discretion, shall ask the Godfathers and Godmothers the Name; and then shall dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying, N. I baptise thee. . . .

¶ placing him conveniently A hassock or stool may be required, especially if it be proposed to dip the head, in which case the font should be full. The Priest will retain the hand for the reception, applying the napkin after the Baptism.

J6²—¶ Then shall the Priest say, We receive this person. . . .

J7¹—¶ Then shall the Priest say, Seein now. . . .

J7²—¶ Then shall be said the Lords Prayer, all kneeling. Our Father. . . . from evil Amen.

J7³—¶ We yield thee humble thanks. . . .

1 Ir. Then shall the Priest say,

J8¹—¶ Then all standing up, the Priest shall use this exhortation following; speaking to the Godfathers and Godmothers first. Forasmuch as these persons have promised. . . .

J8²—(¶ And then, speaking to the ¹new baptised persons, he shall proceed, and say) *And as for you, who have now. . . .*²

[1 Am. om. new 2 (Ir. repeats I19, suitably modified, here). Am. adds, If there be reasonable doubt concerning the baptism of any person, such person may be baptised in the manner herein appointed; saving that, at the immersion or the pouring of water the Min. shall use this form of words, If thou art not already baptised. . . .]

¶ The service should not properly be used separately, but, if for urgent reasons it be so used, it may be concluded as noted under I.

J9¹—¶ It is expedient that every person thus baptised should be confirmed by the Bishop¹ so soon after his Baptism as conveniently may be²; that so he may be admitted to the holy Communion.³

¶ The candidate for Bapt. may conveniently follow the course of instruction and preparation for Confirmation, if such be in progress.

[1 Ir. and receive the HC. 2 Ir. (ends). 3 Ir. ¶ Upon great and urgent cause, persons of riper years may be baptised in private; and then the Priest shall proceed, as in the Private Bapt. of Infants, with such changes as the age of the person to be baptised requires. Am. ¶ Whereas necessity may require the baptising of Adults in private houses, in consideration of extreme sickness; the same is hereby allowed in that case, and a convenient number of persons shall be assembled in the house where the Sacrament is to be administered. And in the exh., Well beloved, etc., instead of these words, come hither desiring, shall be inserted this word desirous. And in case of great necessity, the Min. may begin with the questions addressed to the candidate, and end with the thanksgiving following the baptism.]

J9²—¶ If any persons not baptised in their infancy shall be brought to be baptised before they come to years of discretion to answer for themselves; it may suffice to use the Office for Public Baptism of infants, or (in case of extreme danger) the Office for Private Baptism, onely changing the word (Infant) for (Child or Person) as occasion requireth.¹

[1 Am. ¶ If there be occasion for the Office of Infant Bapt. and that of Adults at the same time, the Min. shall use the exh. and one of the prs. next following in the Office for Adults; only, in the exh. and pr. after the words these Persons and these thy Servants, adding and these Infants. Then the Min. shall proceed to the questions to be demanded in the cases respectively. After the immersion, or the pouring of water, the pr. shall be as in this Service; only, after the words, these thy Servants, shall be added and these Infants. After which the remaining part of each service shall be used, first for Adults, and lastly that for Infants.]

K6—"¶ The "Curate of every Parish shall "diligently "upon Sundayes" and "Holydayes," after the second Lesson at EP "openly in the Church instruct and examine so many children of his Parish sent unto him, as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism."

¶ Though the threat of excommunication for neglect is not repeated from canon 59, the Curate is bound, by himself or deputy, to carry this out in spirit; and he may, in many chs. with edification, fulfil the letter, if he pick his groups carefully, give a pithy instruction on one point, and examine in Parts 1 to 5 on Suns. 1 to 5 in each month, prefacing Parts 1 and 5 with the expanded title in CATECHISM (REVISION OF), and Parts 2-4 with: Q. What were your Godparents told about your training? A. That I was to learn the Creed, Ten Comts., and Lord's Pr., and be virtuously brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life. ¶ all such . . . as he shall think fit] The direction to withhold or present is unlimited in terms, but must be exercised judiciously: i.e., the Curate may not impose private or party standards of doctrine, morals, or devotion, but should solemnly throw the responsibility of a sincere choice on those who do not violate the clearly expressed requirements of the Church.

¶ if the Bp. approve] The Bp.'s discretion is also absolute, and is properly exercised in fixing an ordinary standard of age, or level of instruction, though he can hardly refuse to consider reasonable grounds for exceptions.

L¹—¹The Order of "CONFIRMATION,"² or laying on of hands upon those that are baptised and come to years of discretion.

[1604 The Order. . . hands upon children baptised and able to render an account of their faith according to the Catechism following. 2" wherein is contained a catechism for children."]

[years of discretion] See above on "competent age."

L¹—¶ Upon the day appointed all that are to be then confirmed, being placed, and standing in order before the Bishop¹; he (or some other Minister appointed by him)³ shall read this Preface following.³

[1 Am. sitting in his chair near to the Holy Table 2 Am. may 3 Am. the people standing until the Lord's Pr. (Note, that the Preface was till 1662 a series of rubrics, not ordered to be read.)]

[standing in order] It is convenient to fix the order of places beforehand, so that relatives or friends may go up in pairs.

[this Preface] Usually preceded by a hymn, which should embody pr. for the Holy Spirit, and be set to a well-known tune. Most Bps. issue a paper of instructions for guidance of incumbents, and a full and critical discussion is to be found in Dearmer, PH (7), pp. 450-464.

L¹—"To the end that Confirmation may be ministered to the more edifying of such as shall receive it,"¹ the Church hath thought good to order, "That none hereafter shall be Confirmed, but such as can say"² the Creed, "the Lords Prayer, and the ten Commandments; and can also answer to such"³ other "questions,"³ as in the "short Catechism"⁴ are contained; Which "Order is very convenient to be observed,"⁵ to the end, "that children" being now "come to the years of discretion, and" having "learned what their Godfathers and Godmothers promised for them in Baptism, they may themselves with their own mouth and consent openly before the Church ratify and" confirm "the same; and also promise that by the grace of God they will evermore endeavour themselves faithfully to observe" such things as they by their own confession have assented unto."¹⁰

[1 "(according to St. Paul's doctrine, who teacheth that all things should be done in the ch. to the edification of the same) it is thought good" 2 "in their mother tongue the articles of the faith" 3 "of this" 4 "as the Bp. (or such as he shall appoint) shall by his discretion appose them in. And this 5 "for divers considerations ¶ First, that when children come. . . and have learned. . . they may then. . . 6 "with their own" 7 "confess" 8 "and keep" 9 "mouth and" 10 ¶ Secondly, forasmuch as confirmation is ministered to them that be baptised, that by imposition of hands and prayer they may receive strength and defence against all temptations to sin, and the assaults of the world, and the devil: it is most meet to be ministered, when children come to that age, that partly by the frailty of their own flesh, partly by the assaults of the world and the devil, they begin to be in danger to fall into sin. ¶ Thirdly, for that it is agreeable with the usage of the church in times past, whereby it was ordained, that Confirmation should be ministered to them that were of perfect age, that they being instructed in Christ's religion, should openly profess their own faith, and promise to be obedient unto the will of God. ¶ And that no man shall think that any detriment shall come to children by deferring of their confirmation: he shall know for truth, that it is certain by God's word, that children being baptised (if they depart out of this life in their infancy) are undoubtedly saved.]

L²—¶¹ Then shall the Bishop say, Do ye here. . . ¶ And every one shall audibly answer, I do.

[1 Am. inserts ¶ Then the Min. shall present unto the Bp. those who are to be confirmed, and shall say, Reverend Father in God, I present unto you these children [or these persons] to receive the Laying on of Hands. ¶ Then the Bp., or some Min. appointed by him, may say, Hear the words of the Evangelist St. Luke in the eighth chap. of the book of the Acts of the Apostles.]

[Then shall the Bp. say] A brief, pointed address by the Bp. may, and customarily does, supplement the Exh., and lead up to the Question. Possibly this address would come better at the first entry of the Bp., the hymn next, and the service following without interruption of any kind.

[every one shall . . . answer] The response is usually made collectively, but it has a solemn effect to call over the Christian names in a pre-arranged order as placed, and a change in bapt. name can be thus made. The number presented should not ordinarily exceed 100. The Bp. is seated.

L³—¶¹ "The Bp. Our help. . . Ans. Who hath made heaven and earth." 2 Bp. "Blessed" be "the Name. . . without end." 3 Bp. "Lord, hear our" prayers. "Ans. And let. . ."

[1 "¶ And the Bp. shall confirm them on this wise. ¶ CONFIRMATION." 2 "Min. Blessed is." 3 "Min." The Lord be. . . Ans. and with. . . 4 (till 1604) "prayer."

[The people kneel in conformity with clergy and choir, while the Bp. stands for the verses and pra., as is the rule for benedictory prs., cp. 481. The responses will commonly be best said in the natural voice, and there is no authority for restricting them to the candidates, who should, however, be trained to respond audibly.

L³—Bp. "Let us pray. Almighty. . . sins," 1 "Strengthen them," "we beseech thee, O Lord," "with the" "holy Ghost the Comforter," 2 "and daily increase in them thy" "manifold gifts of grace: the spirit of wisdom. . . godliness; and" 3 "fill" them, O Lord, with the spirit of thy holy fear," now and for ever. 4 "Amen."

[1 "Send down from heaven, we. . . upon them thy" 2 "with the manifold" 3 "fulfil" 4 "Ans." 5 "Min. Sign them, O Lord, and mark them to be thine for ever, by the virtue of thy holy cross and passion. Confirm and strengthen them with the inward unction of thy holy ghost, mercifully unto everlasting life. Amen."

L⁴—¶ "Then" all of them in order kneeling before "the Bishop," he "shall" lay his hand upon "the" "head" of "every" 4 one "severally," "saying," 5 "Defend, O Lord, this" thy "child" [or this thy servant] "with. . . kingdom. Amen."

[1 cross them in the forehead, and 2 Am. hands 3 "their" 4 "child" 5 N. I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and lay my hand upon thee: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. And thus shall he do to every child one after another. And when he hath laid his hand upon every child, then shall he say. The peace of the Lord abide with you. Ans. And with thy spirit.]

[in order] The clergy presenting candidates may successively bring them up in groups, so arranged that they can return and kneel down without being disturbed by others.

[his hand] The wording just covers the practice, only excusable when the numbers are excessive, of confirming two at once. This expedient is least obtrusive if a hand is laid on each head and the words said over both simultaneously in the singular.

L5—¶ "Then shall the Bishop say," 1 The Lord be 'with you. Ans. And with thy Spirit'.
¶ And (all kneeling down) the Bp. shall add, 'Let us pray'. Our Father. . . from evil. Amen.

[1 (See end of n. 5 above.)]

¶ The Bp. stands as before, facing the candidates (and holding his Pastoral Staff).

L5—¶ And 1 this Collect. "Almighty and everlasting God, who makest. . ."

[1 Am. these Collects.]

L5—¶ O Almighty Lord. . . (= H4³).

[1 "shall the Bp. bless the children, thus" saying "2 Ir. inserts. The Bp. may address candidates during the service at his discretion. Am. inserts. The Min. shall not omit to move the persons confirmed to come, without delay, to the Lord's Supper.]

¶ A hymn, and some parting counsels from the Bp., usually precedes, but, perhaps, would better follow, the Blessing.

L6—¶ ¶ And there shall none be admitted to the holy Communion, until such time as he² be confirmed," or be ready and desirous to be confirmed.

¹ (Till 1662 the rubrics K6¹, ², ⁴ stood here, in the form shown in the notes there). ² 'can say the Cat. and'

¶ none be admitted] The rule seems clear; but two liberties are occasionally taken in various parishes: (1) older persons, who have been admitted to full communion in non-episcopal bodies, are, though not formally admitted, still not rejected from the Lord's Table, it being urged that only notorious sinners may be repelled if they present themselves after warning; (2) children are sometimes admitted long before reaching the minimum age fixed by the Bp. of the diocese for Confirmation.

¶ The opening address is by custom abridged without authority, usually (and most excusably) by merely omitting the phrases left out by Ir. under nn. 5, 9. If several Mins. are present, an assistant may read this.]

M2—¶ ¶ 1 And also speaking unto the persons that shall be married, he shall say, *I Require and charge you both. . . that if either of you know any impediment, why ye may not be lawfully joined together in matrimony, 2 ye" do now "confess it. ¶ This, as other parts spoken to the two persons, is said in a lower tone, but clearly and audibly, by the principal officiant, who should be a Priest. Marriage by a Deacon, though valid, is quite irregular, and properly involves the omission of the nuptial benedictions.

M2—"¶ At which day of marriage, if any man do allege" 'and declare' "any impediment why they may not be coupled together in matrimony," by Gods Law, or the Laws of this Realm, "and will be bound, and" 'sufficient' "sureties with him, to the parties, or else put in a caution (to the full value of such charges as the persons to be married do thereby sustain) to prove his allegation: Then the solemnization must be deferred until such time as the truth be tried."

[1 Am. The Min., if he have reason to doubt of the lawfulness of the proposed Marriage, may demand sufficient surety for his indemnification: but if no impediment shall be alleged, or suspected, the Min. shall say to the Man.]

M3—"¶ If no impediment be alleadged, then shall the Curate say unto the man, ¹ N. Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after Gods ordinance, in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour and keep her in sickness and in health? and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live? ¶ The man shall answer, I will."

[1 Ir. and Am. M. 2 Am. others]

¶ [the Curate] He may doubtless, at his discretion, appoint some priest who is a relative or friend of the parties as his deputy. The names (which may be those in commonest use) should be carefully learnt or written out.

M3—"¶ Then shall the ¹ Priest say unto the woman, N. Wilt thou have this man to thy wedded husband, to live together after Gods ordinance, in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour and keep him in sickness and in health, and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long, as ye both shall live? ¶ The woman shall answer, I will."

[1 Am. Minister 2 Am. others]

M4—"¶ Then shall the Minister say, Who giveth this woman to be married to this man? ¶ Then shall they "give their troth to" each "other" in this manner.

M4—"¶ The Minister receiving the woman at her fathers or friends hands, shall cause the man with his right hand to take the woman by her right hand, and" ³ to say after him as followeth. "I N. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to Gods holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth."

¶ [The Min. receiving] He may request the father to place her right hand in his, and then join the hands of the parties, saying the words in short clauses, and at the end adding, sotto voce, Now loose your hands.

M4—"¶ Then shall they loose their hands, and the woman" with her right hand "taking" ¹ the man by his right hand, shall" likewise "say" after the Minister; "I N. take thee N. to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us do part, according to Gods holy ordinance; and thereto I give thee my troth."

[1 "again" 2 Am. and Ir. M. 3 "depart"]

M5—"¶ Then shall they again loose their hands, and the man shall give unto the woman a ring, ¹ laying the same upon the book," 'with the accustomed duty to the Priest and Clerk.' "And the ³ Priest taking the ring, shall deliver it unto the man, to put it upon the fourth finger of the womans left hand. And the man holding the ring there, and taught by the ³ Priest, shall say, With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow; In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost. Amen."

[1 'and other tokens of spousage, as gold or silver' 2 Am. om. to Clerk. 3 Am. Minister 4 Am. om. to worship

¶ The Min. may ask quietly, Have you the ring? The man may conveniently receive also the accustomed duty from his friend, and place it on the book exactly as ordered, thus obviating the need for requesting it in the vestry. Intimation of this procedure should be made when the date is fixed, and a small envelope handed by the vergers to the friend before service for the purpose. The fee usually includes the charge for banns, if not previously paid.

M6—"¶ Then the man leaving the ring upon the fourth finger of the womans left hand," ¹ they shall both kneel down, and ¹ "the Minister shall say, Let us pray." O Eternal God . . . that as Isaac and Rebecca ³ lived faithfully together. . . ."

M6—"¶ Then shall the Priest joyn their right hands together, and say, Those whom God hath joyned together, let no man put asunder."

¶ They remain kneeling till after the Benediction.

M6—"¶ Then shall the Minister speak unto the ¹ people. *Forasmuch as N. and N. have consented together in holy wedlock, and have witnessed the same before God and this company, and thereto have given and pledged their troth either to other, and have declared the same by giving and receiving of a ring, and by joining of hands; I pronounce that they be man and wife together, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost. [1 Am. company 2 Am. and 1 r. M.]

m6—¶ And the Minister shall add this blessing. "God the Father,¹ God the Son,² God the holy Ghost"³ 'bless, preserve and keep you'; "the Lord mercifully with his favour look upon you, and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace, that ye may"⁴ 'so live together' "in this life," 'that' "in the world to come" 'ye may have' "life everlasting. Amen."⁵

1 'bless you.' 2 'keep you.' 3 'lighten your understanding.' 4 'have remission of your sins in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting.' 5 Am. [Form ends here.]

¶ The right hand may be raised for the blessing, but crossing would appear to be an additional and unauthorised ceremony, though used by some.

m7—¶ Then¹ the Minister or Clerks "going to the Lord's table," shall say or sing this Ps. following. Beati omnes. Psal. 128. Blessed are all they. . . . ¶ Or² this Psalm.³ Deus misereatur. Psal. 67. God be merciful unto us. . . .

[1 'shall they go into the quire, and' 2 "else" 3 "following."]

¶ Min. or Clerks The rubric seems to be loosely drawn, and it is doubtful if the Clerks, who may sing the Ps. are meant to join the procession, and by custom the choir sing in their stalls. The Min. may beckon or invite the new-married pair to follow him, and the Verger should prevent others from moving forward.

m8—¶ The Psalm ended, and the man and the woman kneeling before the "1 'Lords Table,' " the Priest standing at the "1 'Table,' " and turning his face towards them, shall say, *Lord, have. . . . Ans. ¶ standing . . . and turning He faces the Table till after Gloria Patri, and then turns to say the prs., saying softly, Kneel, and signing with his hand to the people to kneel (if there be no choir to take the lead), or else interpolating, Let us pray. Books open at this page should be placed at the kneeling step on the mat or cushions, and the married pair may be bidden to be ready to respond. If another Priest be present he may replace the officiant, who will kneel at one side.

¶ The preacher, who may be another Min., will stand at the Table; and the sermon, which should be short and plain, and may consist of a very few clear and weighty sentences, should show the relation of MARRIAGE to the PB ideal of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION. It may be preceded or followed by a hymn; and the service, if HC does not follow, may be closed by such a commendatory Benediction as m5⁴.

m9—¶ It is convenient that "the new married persons" ² should "receive the holy Communion" at the time of their marriage, or at the first opportunity after their marriage.

¶ The woman By a seemly old custom, she should be accompanied by one or more "honest Wives."

¶ decently apparelled The wearing of a white veil was enforced before 1662, when these words were inserted; but, as the usage has not persisted, and the phrase is not precise, the veil can hardly be insisted upon as law, and its expediency in practice may be doubted.

¶ some convenient place A front pew, the chancel step, or the kneeling step at the Communion rails are accustomed in different chs., and the Ordinary seldom or never intervenes.

¶ The Priest will wear surplice and scarf or hood, and stand facing the woman throughout, as it is a service of benediction.

T¹—¶ The Preface.—It is evident unto all men diligently reading holy Scripture and ancient Authors, that from the Apostles time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ’s Church; Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. Which Offices were evermore had in such reverend estimation, that no man¹ might presume to execute any of them, except he were first called, tried, examined, and known to have such qualities as are requisite for the same; and also by publick prayer, with imposition of hands, were approved and admitted thereunto “by lawful Authority. “And therefore, to the intent that these Orders may be continued, and reverently used and esteemed in the Church of England; “No man “shall “be accounted or taken to be a lawful “Bp., Priest, or Deacon “in the Church of England, or suffered to “execute any of “the said Functions, “except he be called, tried, examined and admitted “thereunto, “according to the Form hereafter following,” or hath had formerly Episcopal Consecration, or Ordination.

[1 “by his own private authority” 2 “it is requisite that no man (not being at this present Bp., Priest, or Deacon) shall execute any of them]

T¹—¶ And none shall be admitted a Deacon,¹ except he be Twenty three years of age, “unless he have a Faculty. “And every man which is to be admitted a Priest, shall be full Four and twenty years old. And every man which is to be “Ordained or “Consecrated “Bp., shall be fully Thirty years of age.”

[1 Am. Priest, or Bp., except he be of the age which the Canon in that case provided may require. 2 “a”]

T¹—¶ And the Bp. knowing either by himself, or by sufficient testimony, any person to be a man of virtuous conversation, and without crime, and after examination and tryal, finding him¹ learned in the Latine Tongue, and¹ sufficiently instructed in holy Scripture,¹ may “at the times appointed in the Canon,¹ or else on urgent occasion, “upon “some other “Sunday or Holyday, in the face of the Church, admit him a Deacon, in such manner and form as¹ hereafter¹ followeth.”

[1 Am. om. 2 Am. and otherwise learned as the Canons require 3 “a” 4 Am. day]

T1—¶ The Form and Manner of “Making “of DEACONS.”

[1 “Ordering”]

T1—¶ ¶ “When the day appointed by the Bp. is come,” after MP is ended, “there shall be a “Sermon or “Exhortation, declaring the Duty and Office of such as come to be admitted “Deacons; “how necessary “that Order is “in the Ch. of Christ; and also, how the people ought to esteem them in their “Office.

[1 “First” 2 “Ministers” 3 “Such orders are” 4 “vocation”]

¶ When an Ordination is held at a parish ch., it will be for the incumbent to see that “all things are duly prepared in the ch., and set in order” (T3 1). He will need to learn in detail from the bp.’s chaplain the accustomed order and ceremonial, and to think out carefully its adaptation to his ch. The order of Procession should be settled, and may be printed on a special service paper.

¶ After MP It is convenient for MP to be said at an earlier hour to avoid an unduly long service.

¶ There shall be a Sermon This should be marked by solemnity, calmness, unity, and brevity, to have due effect. It will be preceded by a hymn, and may well be prefaced by a short and fit version of the BIDDING PRAYER.

T1¹—¶ ¶ First “the Arch-Deacon or¹ his Deputy shall present¹ unto the Bishop” (sitting in his Chair, near to the holy Table) such as desire to be ordained Deacons; 4 (each "of them" being decently habited) 'saying' "these words, Reverend Father in God, I present unto you these persons present to be admitted Deacons. The Bp. Take heed that the persons whom ye present unto us, be apt and meet, for their learning and godly conversation, to exercise their Ministry duly, to the honour of God, and the edifying of his Church. ¶ The Arch-Deacon shall answer, I have enquired of them, and also examined them, and think them so to be.

[1 "After the Exh. ended" 2 Am. A priest shall 1r. or, in his absence, one appointed in his stead (cp. r2'). 3 "such as come to be admitted, to" 4 every one of them that are presented having upon him a plain alb: and the Archdeacon or his deputy shall say']

¶ The Bp. sitting in his Chair. The CHAIR may usually best be placed at the chancel entrance.

¶ decently habited, i.e., in cassock, surplice, and hood. By custom, a Deacon after his ordination is instructed to wear his "stole" (i.e., tippet or scarf, an "ornament" properly academic—for graduates, not eccles.) obliquely, the ends being hooked together.

1r²—¶ "Then the Bp. shall say unto the people, Brethren, if there be any of you who knoweth any impediment or notable crime in any of these persons presented to be ordered Deacons, for the which he ought not to be admitted to that Office, let him come forth in the Name of God, and shew what the crime or impediment is. ¶ And if any great crime or impediment be objected, the Bishop shall surcease from Ordering that person, until such time as the party accused shall be found clear of that crime."

[1 "And"]

1r¹—¶ "Then the Bishop (commending such as shall be found meet to be Ordered, to the prayers of the Congregation) "shall," with the "1 Clergy, "and people present, sing or say the Litany," with the Prayers, "as followeth.—3 The Litany and Suffrages." [As F, but om. Pr. of St. Chrys. (1662) and Grace, and in 1662 insert special suffrage following]. That it may please thee to bless these thy servants, now to be admitted to the Order of Deacons [or Priests] and to pour thy grace upon them; that they may duly execute their Office, to the edifying of thy church, and the glory of thy holy name; We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord.

Note that the legal effect within the Eng. Ch. of the Rubrics in the above Synopsis is discussed fully under RITUAL LAW, §§ 1-4, cp. also RUBRICS, TRADITIONS OF THE CHURCH, USAGE. Particular aspects are treated below.

V. "RITUAL" PROPER: LITURGICAL FORMS.

The first main division of the subject of R. is, we have seen, (§ 1) Ritual proper, or the words of the liturgical forms used in the PB.

54. Introductory.

The words are of primary importance, as their meaning and purpose must regulate and control the various accompaniments and modes of rendering them. Little need be added as to principles and policy to what has already been said in §§ 2 ff. It may, however, be pointed out that in a vernacular liturgy the obligation is peculiarly binding, that all shall be generally edifying and intelligible. The moments or phases of religious thought and feeling which require orderly expression are: (a) Penitence, (b) Praise and contemplation, (c) Appropriating faith, (d) Prayer and self-surrender. And the question at once arises, whether this expression ought not to be left dependent upon the prompting of the Spirit at the moment.

The PB (B3) claims that "Christ's Gospel . . . is a religion to serve God, not in bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of the spirit." Why, then, it may be asked, should the Christian's heritage of freedom be so fenced in by rubric and custom as it is in the liturgical worship of the Ch. of Eng.? It is generally easy to make objections to any appointment of public policy. What suits one at least seems not to suit another. There are, of course, points of detail on which real improvement is generally admitted to be both possible and desirable. Something is said about this side of the question under REVISION. But, as regards the main lines of policy which have been followed in the construction of the PB, a clear challenge to suggest better may be issued to anyone who objects to them on fundamental grounds.

The Church's plan is, broadly, that the material of our services shall, in the main at least, be appointed by authority, and that, along with certain fixed elements consisting of prs., canticles, creeds and responses, making up an ordered framework, there shall be variable collects, prs., Scripture selections, and proper prefaces. The sermon is left to the discretion of the minister, together with the choice of hymns and anthems and any pulpit prayers. What then are the alternatives?

55. The Church's Plan.

There is first what we may call the plan of universal freedom. By this arrangement, or want of arrangement, everything is left to the individual impulse of the members of the congregation, who sing or pray or exhort or read Scripture as the spirit moves them. Anyone who wants to see what intolerable confusion may arise from this method has only to read 1 Cor. 14, or to look up the records of the 1905 Welsh revival. That there are times and seasons when the gifts of private Christians for prayer and exhortation may under due control be profitably utilised, we may well admit. But, that on the stated occasions of public worship Christians should be at the mercy of the unorganised and unprepared effusions of the more emotional members of the community, seems forbidden by the apostolic maxim, "Let all things be done decently and in order." Moreover, even if the demon of disorder be exorcised by the influence of the more staid members of the community, the alternative is apt to be the still less inspiring spirit of dulness.

This brings us at once to the second alternative, which may be described as ministerial freedom. The people may or may not choose their minister, but, while he is there, the sheep must follow the shepherd's guidance. They may or may not like the stock phrases and recurrent topics of his prayers, but they can have no other. He may ring the changes in his lessons from the Bible upon a few familiar passages, mostly of the same type. They have no remedy except the drastic one of changing their minister, with the probability that they will suffer equally under the new one. Or, if the congregation through its officers is able to insist on having what it is thought will be popular, can it be seriously supposed that any local congregation, mainly composed of persons without liturgical training, and without access through history to the stored experience of the past, can make adequate provision for so high an activity of the human spirit as Divine worship?

Accordingly, in that highly organised group of churches which own the Presbyterian discipline, a prescribed order is laid down in the shape of an outline to which the service is to conform. And the stability and solidity of this group in Scotland and America are evidence of the value of this further restraint upon the caprice of individuals or single communities. At the same time, the growing movement in Scotland in favour of the old liturgical forms, and the large and admitted use made of the PB among English Nonconformists, are reminders that the plan of ministerial autocracy is not found satisfactory in days when, through increased travelling and more frequent change of residence, there is a wider acquaintance with the practice of the Anglican churches.

Now the plans we have discussed have been plans intended to secure the largest amount of freedom. The Nonconformist bodies pride themselves on being the "Free" churches. But it is a profoundly philosophical truth, that without necessity there can be no freedom. (Cp MAN, § 20.) So the plan of indulging the individual impulses of the worshippers does not get rid of necessity. Their necessity takes the threefold form of (1) uncertainty (nobody can tell what is coming next), (2) disorder (the successive elements of pr. or praise are usually without harmonious connection), and (3) indecency (for the clashing of individual wills and voices mars the dignity of worship). The silent majority under such a method is as much under the necessity of worshipping through other people's words as Eng. Churchmen are. But they have not the same guarantee that those words shall be well ordered, fitly phrased, and worthy in every way of the time and place and end. Similarly, where the congregation have in all respects to worship as the minister pleases, his seeming freedom is their necessity. On the wings of his words or not at all his people must make their flight heavenwards. And if, as is likely to be the case, the man slips into ruts of his own making, and becomes the victim of a mean sort of necessity, shut in upon a track settled by his own narrowness, then the people, too, find in his limitations a necessary situation from which their worship must start doubly restrained.

Turning to the stately but intelligible forms of the PB, in which the fixed framework gives smoothness and order to the whole, in which the varying psalms and lessons and collects are ever intervening to give point and freshness to prayer and praise, it need not, we see, be irksome to find present the element of necessity. It is not blind necessity, but the sober product of the prayerful labours of wise and holy men, deeply learned in the devotional treasures of the past, and newly stirred to lay hold upon the simplicity of the religion of Jesus Christ, as it is set forth in the NT. (See further, FORMS OF PRAYER for the historical side.)

The various elements noted as needing expression are all duly provided for in the PB. (a) Penitence is tested, guided and rewarded in the Preparation at MEP (D1, E1), and, for HC (H1), in the Conf., Absol., and Comfortable Words (H2), in the profession of discipleship at Confirm., in the Comm., and the Vis. of the Sick. (b) Praise has its channels in Pss., Lessons, Canticles, Versicles, Sandus, Gloria in excelsis, etc. (c) Opportunity is given for the outflow of appropriating faith in the recital of the Creeds, at the reception of the Sacraments and the laying on of hands, and through the benedictions and thanksgivings of Matr., Churching, and Burial. (d) For Prayer and self-surrender, the Lit., Colls., Occasional Prs., Comm., Pr. for the Ch. Militant, and Post-communion prs. in HC, etc., make rich provision.¹

¹ Though the material under this head is varied and abundant, yet it cannot be said that its variety and abundance are made available so freely as the stores utilised under the other heads. There are cycles of daily Pss. and daily Lessons, but no cycle of Prs. except the Colls. (see COMMON PRAYER, § 5). A little compilation, called Church Prayer (issued in a cheap form by Nisbet), has been sanctioned by a number of Bps. for use at additional services or (on week-days) in place of the prs. which may be omitted after the 3rd Collect. In it "the entire body of Colls. and Prs. in the PB, so far as they lend them-

57. Failure of Alternative.

(e) And finally the Pss., anthems, and hymns, by their varied character, lend themselves first to one, and then to another, of the ends of worship.

For a detailed account of the changes made on the introduction of the First PB and at the subsequent revisions, see HISTORY OF THE PB. These may here be very briefly summarised. In 1549 there was translation and thoroughgoing reconstruction. In 1552 additions were made to MEP and elsewhere, excisions took place in HC and Bapt., and the whole was revised. In 1554 the Eng. PB became illegal. In 1559 the Second PB was re-established with three specified alterations, several additional prs. and two rubrics being inserted in the printed books without statutory authority. In 1604 similar additions were made, including the last part of the Catechism. In 1662 a thorough revision took place. In 1872 the SHORTENED SERVICES ACT allowed abridgments and additions under prescribed conditions. Besides this, a PB was issued for Scotland in 1637, a drastic revision which was never received anywhere, though its Communion Office (revised) has been since adopted as an alternative by the Scottish Ch. In 1789 and 1892 revisions were carried through by the American Ch., and in 1877 the disestablished Ch. of Ireland completed an independent revision. Full details of the variations of all these (except the 1637 book) are given above in the Synopsis, §§ 20, 53.

It may be of interest to introduce here some historical illustrations of the process of liturgical change. They relate mainly to the period just before and after the First PB, the former showing how it was prepared for, and the latter indicating the system of sanctioning additional rites and ceremonies for cath. and collegiate chs., or illustrating the action taken under the Acts of Unif. by contemporary authorities.

61. Historical Illustrations.

(a) 1535. A short form of Bidding Pr. was contained in the King's Letter to Cranmer about preachers (Wilkins, Conc. 3 807).

(b) 1538. R. Injns. ordered, "That the knelling of aves after service . . . henceforth be . . . omitted." Also "where in time past men have used . . . in their processions to sing Ora pro nobis to so many saints, that they had no time to sing the good suffrages following, as Parce nobis Domine, and Libera nos Domine, it must be taught . . . that better it were to omit Ora pro nobis, and sing the other suffrages" (VAI 2 42).

(c) Bp. Shaxton in 1538 ordered "that the 28th chap. of Deut. be openly read in the Ch. every quarter instead of the General Sentence" (VAI 2 55, where it is noted that the latter was a solemn curse, already limited in 1535, and become untimely from its denunciation of robbers of churches, as Strype remarks). Shaxton's order prepared the way for the Communion.

selves to general use, has been divided into ten groups according to subject. To each day in a ten days' cycle ten Colls. are assigned, one taken from each group," five appointed for MP and five for EP. A particular intention (which may be readily varied by the officiant) is attached to each by a short title and a pair of Vs. and Rv. Indexes enable Church Prayer to be used as a storehouse of prs. for various occasions. Additional prs. for the parish, Missions, the Cath., etc., are included.

He also ordered the Ep. and Gospel or one of them to be read in English "in the pulpit or other convenient place as the people may have," and every Sunday and holy-day a NT chapter after the lessons at Mattins, and an OT chap. after Magnificat.

(d) 1547. Royal arts. (VAI 2 100, cp. R. Injns., p. 126) inquire "whether they have the procession book in English, and . . . use none other Lit. but that . . . in the same book; . . . and whether they have had the same Lit. as oft as they were commanded." Also "whether they have put out of their Ch. books this word papa [ordered in 1535 to be erased], and the name and service of Thomas Becket, and prayers having rubrics containing pardons or indulgences, and all other superstitious legends and prayers."

(e) R. Injns. order that "when any sermon or Homily shall be had, the Prime and hours shall be omitted," and prescribe a form of Bidding Pr. in which the older practice of praying for the present felicity of the departed is altered into a prayer "that they with us, and we with them at the day of judgment may rest both body and soul, with Abraham . . . in the kingdom of heaven." The R. Injns. for Cant. Cath., 1547, order "that in consideration of the sermon or else the Homilies to be made on the holy-days, no Lady Mass on these days to be sung in the quire," and also "all sequences to be omitted and hereafter no more to be sung in the quire neither working day nor holy-day" (VAI 2 142).

(f) The R. Injns. of Winchester Cath., 1547, order "that the sermon henceforth shall be preached between Mattins and Mass, and that all manner of eccles. persons and other ministers of this Ch. shall be present at the said sermon. And on such days as the sermon is preached, Our Lady Mass and Prime and the Hours to be omitted," this last direction combining two noted above. "The singing of any Hours, Prime, Dirges, or Commendations" was to be omitted, "but every man to say the same as he hath time or is disposed." Cp. similar provisions at Lincoln in 1548 (VAI 2 169). Two forms of anthem, with following pair of versicles and collect, are provided, displacing all others.

(g) At St. George's, Windsor, the Visitors of 1547 (VAI 2 165) ordered "that the choristers shall daily say Mattins in English before the beginning of service in the morning: and likewise Evensong in English before the choir begin Evensong." (Frere notes that Wriothesley, Chron. 2 2, relates that in May, 1548, Mattins and Evensong were said in English in St. Paul's and other London churches. It is not clear whether this means that a rendering in Eng. was already in print. Possibly the prayers were translated specially, and the pss. and lessons read from the Eng. Bible, or the Primer may have been used.) The "petit-canon and clerks" were also now to be "exonerated and discharged from saying our Lady Mattins and Evensong, and from saying ferial dirges, and June (?) masses in the choir," these last being prob. royal commemorations.

(h) The R. Injns. in 1547 (VAI 2 123) had enforced generally Bp. Shaxton's rule in 1538 for Scripture lessons in English. The rule is extended in 1548 for Lincoln Cath. (VAI 2 167) by ordering "every day 2 chaps. read in Eng., one of the NT and one of the OT, one afore the place of Te Deum at Matins, and the other after Magnificat at Evensong." To leave time for this Bible reading the R. Injns. provided that "when 9 lessons should be read in the ch., 3 of them shall be . . . left out with the Responds, and at Evensong the Responds with all the Memories" (i.e., "the antiphons, versicles and collects commemorating Our Lady, the Holy Cross, etc., said daily at the end of the office," VAI 2 123). Also at Lincoln

"they shall from henceforth sing or say no anthems of Our Lady or other Saints, but only of our Lord, and then not in Latin, but choosing out the best and most sounding to Christian religion they shall turn the same into English . . . and after them read the collect for the preservation of the King's Majesty and the magistrates, which is contained and set forth in the English suffrage" (i.e., the Lit.).

(i) The R. Injns. in 1547 (VAI 2 124) ordered "immediately before High Mass" "the Lit. which is set forth in English with all the suffrages following . . . adding nothing thereunto but as the King's Grace shall hereafter appoint." Further, the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Decalogue were to be read in English every holy-day.

(j) At Lincoln in 1548 was ordered (VAI 2 168): "And the subdeacon to show bef. the Ep. the name of the writer and the chap., and likewise before the Gospel when the deacon hath said in this wise, The Gospel following is after the Evangelist St. Matthew, etc., naming the chap., the choir shall answer Glory be to God for it. And after the Gospel the deacon shall say Thanks be to God, and God save the King." (Frere notes that the Sarum use contains no response, but supposes that this is not an innovation here.)

For the 1548 Order of Communion, see HISTORY OF PB, and notes to H¹, H², H³, H⁵.

(k) In 1550 an order for Founder's Day was made for St. George's, Windsor, including versicles and special collect of memorial.

(l) Ridley's arts. (May, 1550, see VAI 2 234) imply a celebration as the normal thing on Weds. and Fridays, by inquiring whether on these days "is said or sung the Eng. Procession in the ch., and whether the minister (if there be none to communicate with him) doth say such prs. aft. the Lit., as are appointed for the Communion until the Offertory." His 6th Injn. (VAI 2 244) was "that the min. in the time of the Communion immediately after the offertory, shall monish the communicants, saying these words or such like, Now is the time, if it please you, to remember the poor men's chest with your charitable alms." This was a particular way of carrying out R. Injn. No. 29, of 1547, and a form to simplify obedience to an Act of Parl. of 1547 (1 Ed. 6, c. 3, s. 16). It may also be taken (along with informal instructions often given by the clergy at weddings, funerals, christenings, etc., or on emergencies during the ordinary services) as subsidiary to and required by the PB.

(m) The R. Injns. for Salisbury Cath., 1559 (VAI 3 33, cp. Exeter, p. 41), provided for an early short service daily, Gen. Conf. and Absol., Lit. to end of Collect, NT Lesson, Anthem and suffrages from "O Lord arise." This illustrates the practice of elasticity in cath. chs., in regard to the Act of Unif. Also on Mon., Wed., and Fri., at 9 a.m. they were to have the Veni Creator in plainsong, followed by a lecture in divinity, or chap. of Erasmus' paraphrases (and Tues., Thurs., and Sat., simply reading of the paraphrase). Then the choir were to "sing the Lord's Pr. in English," and the lecturer closed with a collect.

(n) In Dec., 1559, certain Londoners with some of the citizens invaded the choir of Exeter Cath. at the early morning service and interpolated metrical pss. The Chapter reproved them, and they appealed to the Visitors who bid them encourage "these . . . godly doings" of the innovators. And, finally, the Eccles. Commissioners set aside the plea of the Chapter based on the strict nature of the Act, and so established a precedent for hymns and metrical pss.

¹ Frere notes (VAI 2 109 n.) that this was "an important change, for the Lit. had long ceased to be used as the normal preparation for Mass."

(o) Bp. Parkhurst in 1561 (VAI 3 105) asked whether the clerks "used to sing any number of pss. dirge-like at the burial of the dead, or do any other thing otherwise than it is appointed by the common order of the service-book."

(p) Abp. Parker, writing to Cecil on July 23, 1563, relates how he has revised an old prayer for use in his cath. and in the parish chs. at Cant. on Mon., Wed., and Fri., continuing, "Sir, this I have done, not enjoining the like to the rest of my diocese, nor to the rest of my province, for want of sufficient warrant from the prince or council. . . . And although ye may say, we by our vocation should have special regard of such matter, yet because we be holden within certain limits by statutes, we may stand in doubt how it will be taken if we should give order therein." On Aug. 1 the Queen wrote to authorise him in these terms, "Understanding that you have thought and considered upon some good order to be prescribed therein, for the which ye require our authority . . . we do . . . command all manner our ministers . . . to . . . obey such . . . orders as you, being primate of all England, and metropolitan of this province of Cant., upon godly advice and consideration, shall uniformly devise, publish, and prescribe." Cecil at the same time sent a form prepared by Grindal and revised by himself, which Parker further revised so as to conform it more closely to the PB. A reference to the Form in Eliz. Liturgies (P.S.), p. 478, will illustrate a sentence in Parker's reply, "I wish the collects had been shorter, and I fear the service to be too long for our cold devotions."

The law of R. proper is expressed in detail in the rubrics, tables and other directive contents of the PB (§§ 15-53); but these are imposed and enforced by the Act of Unif., 1662, and previous Acts expressly confirmed by it, except so far as these conditions are varied by the PB (Tables of Lessons) Act, 1871 (which permits the Ordinary to permit other Pss. and Lessons on all occasions, if desirable for edification's sake, at his discretion), the SHORTENED SERVICES ACT, and the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, s. 13 (which allows a min. to use a service taken from Bible and PB on request or where the PB form may not be used). In the art. on R. LAW (§§ 2-4) the general law is summarised. The rule that "omission is prohibition" is clearest in application to R. proper.

Only a single exception under this head is named by Sir W. Phillimore in a long list of points alleged by him in applying the reductio ad absurdum argument to the ruling of the courts as to the strict interpretation of the Acts of Unif. (R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 224-227), and that is the use of the short ascriptions of praise before and after the Gospel [cp. § 61 (7) above; also § 36, H¹, n. 9, for usages of First PB, and Am. and Ir. PBs.]. As to this it appears that the statement in Pref.³ (§ 18, n. 2), that "for this cause be cut off Anthems, Responds, Invitations, and such like things," is decisive; these were only "cut off" by omission. Similarly the ministerial omissions noted by the same witness,¹ so far from being legitimate just because they sometimes or even constantly occur, seem plain breaches of the Acts. Some are properly accepted as technical violations sanctioned by custom, others show carelessness or negligence or arbitrariness. But all are explicable as instances of non-enforcement (RITUAL LAW, § 3).¹

The Acts of Unif., however, only cover the specified occasions and forms of service named in them or explicitly covered by them, requiring the prescribed forms without variation and forbidding the substitution of others. The Act of 1559 contained in s. 26 a provision for "further ceremonies and rites," under which in Q. Eliz.'s reign not a few authorised occasional additions to the services were made (see Lit. Services of Q. Eliz., PS.). But it has sometimes been held that the powers of this section expired with the reign. Whether that be so or not, as a matter of legal technicality, it has been an unbroken custom for the sovereign in council, on "the advice of the metropolitan of the realm," to sanction special prs. in time of war, plague, or calamity, and corresponding thanksgivings.² The CORONATION SERVICE is a State Form, and is not rendered in a parish or ordinary cath. ch., neither is it a substitute for any PB form, though the Lit. and HC are included in it. Similarly, the services for the CONSECRATION of a ch. or churchyard, and for INSTITUTION and INDUCTION, which are ordered by the bp. for each diocese, are non-competitive services, and the right of ordering them is sanctioned by ancient custom. But beyond these limits it is clear, as the unanimous Report of the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. states (p. 10), that "the Acts of Unif. bind bps. as well as other clergymen, and that the law does not recognise any right in a bp. to overrule the provisions as to services, rites, and ceremonies contained in those Acts," one of which, it may be added, was formally subscribed by the Convs., and all of which have "been received by this Ch." by long acquiescence.

63. Additional Services.

"Pr. in this form, or to this effect, as briefly as conveniently they may." And in any case the sermon is not a "ministration" but an authorised interpolation or supplement (Re Robinson, Wright v. Tugwell, 1897, in L.R., 1897, Chanc. Div. 185).

¹ So in the Lambeth opinion, 1899, on Incense and Lights, the Abps. said: "It is quite true that there may be variations which are so brief, so long in use, so unimportant, that a bp. would be justified in refusing to allow a clergyman to be prosecuted because of his use of them. No authority has been found for the short sentences which in many churches the people are accustomed to say or sing immediately before and after the reading of the Gospel in the Communion Office. . . . There is no authority for shortening the exh. which the min. is to read when giving notice of the HC. The practices are probably in strictness all illegal; but no bp. would be wise in allowing a prosecution for such unimportant variations from the strict letter of the law. This cannot, however, be said of the introduction of any ceremony which is conspicuous, not sanctioned by long-continued custom in our Ch., and of such a nature as to change the general character and aspect of the service."

Two cases remain to be noticed. 1° The legitimacy of hymns, for which a precedent has been recorded under § 61 (7), has affirmed by Lord Stowell in 1792, and re-affirmed in the Lincoln Judgment. The proper view seems to be, not that custom was allowed to set aside the statute, but that custom, long continued and under authoritative sanction, showed that the use of hymns which do not interrupt the service—a condition seldom recollected—does not contravene the Acts, they being extra-liturgical elements, and therefore remaining under the ius liturgicum of the bp. 2° The Act of 1549 contained the following proviso, which is still in force, "that it shall be lawful for all men, as well in chs., chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any ps. or pr. taken out of the Bible, at any due time, not letting or omitting thereby the service or any part thereof mentioned in the same book." Under this proviso Abp. Benson ruled that though the priest may not himself "let the service" by reciting or singing Agnus Dei, this anthem may be sung by the choir during the Communion. The corresponding anthem Benedictus Qui after Sanctus is excluded by the same rule.

Those bps. then who take upon themselves to sanction special colls., epistles, and gospels for abrogated holy-days, are taking the law into their own hands.¹ It may be questioned whether the need was of the kind or urgency to demand such action. The sanction of special colls. for Foreign Missions, Harvest Thanksgiving, etc., can plead in justification a legitimate and widespread need.

It sometimes happens, especially in the country, that through illness, accident, or mishap, the incumbent (or his deputy) is not in his place to conduct service. If, or as soon as, the wardens, sidesmen, or other responsible parishioners present are persuaded that no officiating minister will arrive or can be procured, it is most advisable not to dismiss the congregation forthwith. Resort should rather be had to some lay person or persons, best qualified by education and otherwise, who may lead the people in such parts of MP or EP as do not require an ordained minister. Such an emergency service might be made up as follows:—Two or three Sentences, General Confession, Lord's Prayer, Versicles, Gloria, Venite, Psalms, 1st Lesson, Canticle, and Lesson, Canticle, Creed, Lesser Litany, Lord's Pr., Hymn, Litany (to Lord's Pr.), Hymn, Grace.—B2, R1.

VI. CEREMONIAL.

The distinction between rites and ceremonies has not always been kept clear in common parlance. The term "rite" has constantly been used in ordinary literature to include the outward acts as well as the wording of a form of service. Similarly, the word "ceremony" has been applied on the one hand to the whole order of service, and on the other hand to an ornament used in it, the surplice being referred to as a "ceremony." It seems best, however, to regard these varying usages not as indicating an essential ambiguity about the terms, but rather as being loose, but natural, extensions of the meaning of words, which have in eccles. and liturgical writings their proper and technical significations. And this may be more confidently claimed in respect of "ceremony" than of "rite," for the latter, as we shall see, requires some ceremonial, whereas many ceremonies can be independently performed, though—as Frere points out (Rel. Cer., p. 143 f.)—added ceremonial often brings with it fresh liturgical material. R. has, therefore, been used in a wider sense as an appointed order of worship, and in a narrower as concerned with the words contained in that order. Ceremonial is more specifically limited to cover the mode in which a rite is rendered, and the use of all external accompaniments and adjuncts of the liturgical forms of worship. R. proper appoints what is to be said: ceremonial decides how the appointed words are to be rendered. One settles the matter and the other the manner. The difference is, however, one of convenience, for the idea of both is the same, to express the several impulses of the worshipful spirit in fellowship with a congregation of Christian people (see above, § 1).

One other point needs to be cleared up. Some ceremonies require special ornaments for their performance. These are most conveniently considered under that head (App. R3, and vii below); but the use of an ornament is also a ceremony. Others need no accessories, or only materials like water, bread, and wine, which are consumed in the process. All these come directly under ceremonial.

66. Need for Ceremonial.

Decency and order require some customary method of conducting a prescribed order of praise and prayer. And where, as in the case of sacraments and kindred ordinances, some solemn ceremony is of the essence of the rite, the necessity of regulating the details is even more obvious. But a moment's thought, or consideration of experience, will show that any kind of public worship requires some authoritative settling of the externals. For the freest and most unconventional religious bodies settle down into a routine of postures, gestures, positions, and modes of rendering words, which is nothing else but a ceremonial use. It is the same with ritual as with etiquette. See MAN, §§ 12, 14, 25 (Table II), noting the section numbered 8* in each. Words want their setting. We have not only our words of greeting and farewell to express what we recognise as due to our neighbour, but the bow and the handshake, and so forth, as ceremonial adjuncts and complements of the words.

Accordingly the Ch. of Eng. has always retained, as expressing her unaltered mind, Cranmer's Pref.³ Of Ceremonies (§ 19 above), which deserves attentive study as a classical vindication of religious ceremonial. We shall have to return to it later, but may adduce here a passage of kindred spirit from a Caroline divine.

"The circumstances and ceremonies of public service is, indeed, a kind of discipline and pedagogy, whereby men subject to sense are guided in the exercise of godliness: it is, as it were, the apparel of religion," which might be dispensed with "did men consist of minds alone without bodies, but as long as our bodily senses are manageable to our soul's advantage, the heat within will starve without that apparel without. And therefore . . . I hold it requisite that the observance of rites and ceremonies in the public service of God should increase and become more solemn after the world was come into the Ch., than under the persecuting times of it. Persecution was like (an enclosing fence), in preserving order and reverence in the public offices of the Ch., with the respect of those guides that ruled it. But since the net of the Gospel hath been cast in the ocean, and caught good and bad, it is more requisite that all should pass, as under rule and observance, so in the most reverent form, that the coldness and indifference of the worse part appear not to debase the good disposition of others" (Thorndike, Works 1 301 f.).

The peculiar function of ceremonial is twofold. (1) It regulates alternative ways of rendering prescribed rites. The service must be said or sung, with or without choir, organ, instruments. Mins. and people must stand, sit, or kneel; enter and depart singly or in procession; remain here or move there; face this way or that or the other; do something (that has to be done) at one or another point of the service. (2) It governs any added significant usages, gestures, actions, and movements, such as the sign of the Cross in Bapt., the laying on of hands, the bowing at the Holy Name.

Thorndike judiciously expresses the caution that is needed in regard to ceremonial, and lays stress on that practical aspect of it as a department of Ch. ORDER, which has been emphasised in this art. and elsewhere.

70. Need for Caution.

He says, "For the nature and kind of that which is to be done, respect is to be had to the end proposed. If the particular observed be not, according to reason, a circumstance apt to procure, to maintain in ourselves, to express and convey to others, that intention and reverence which the service of God requireth, for what cause shall we say it is observed? Shall it be thought acceptable to God alone of itself, without reference to the due end and purpose? . . . Besides, others that are not offensive for their kind, for their number may prove no less. For where the circumstances and ceremonies of public service are multiplied beyond measure, there the mind, distracted into a number of outward observations, cannot allow that attention to the substance which it spendeth upon the circumstance" (Works 1 307).

For an illuminating survey of the growth of Christian ceremonial, reference may be made to Frere, Principles of Religious Cer., pp. 49-102. Here we can only illustrate the significance of the remodelling of English uses, which is represented by the PBs, by a quotation from the same writer (Lit. Ref., p. 13):

"The early mediæval ritual was as full of ornament as a rich Gothic building; in the later mediæval rites, and in much of the foreign liturgical practice, there is a debased survival of this ornament; it has been degraded till it has become meaningless, and it continues only by the force of unthinking tradition. One great characteristic of the English rite is its return to massive and even bare simplicity."

The ceremonial regulations, which led up to and followed upon the First PB, may be broadly grouped under periods.

I. Explanation was resorted to, with a gradual introduction of restrictions. The Rationale of Ceremonial, c. 1540-1543 (ed. 1910 for the Alcuin Club), represents the culmination of this tendency. So, while in 1535 (ib., p. xix) "R. Ward was charged with having called on the clergy to explain sacraments and ceremonies as well as citations [i.e., demands for money] which they always explained in English," about 1539 a correspondent wrote to a foreign Protestant that "here ceremonies are still tolerated, but explanations are added." A little later (c. 1544), John Bale complained that "they are now become laudable ceremonies, whereas before time they were but ceremonies alone." Restriction is evidenced by Latimer's Injn. of 1537 (VAl 2 17), "That preaching be not set aside for any manner of observance in the Ch., as processions and other ceremonies." An attractive specimen of what was done in the way of explanation may be found in an Injn. given by R. Visitors at Doncaster (c. 1547).

"Item, you shall every Sun., at the time of your going about the ch. with holy water, into 3 or 4 places, where most audience and assembly of people is, for the declaration of the ceremonies, say distinctly and plainly, that your parishioners may well hear and perceive the same, these words, 'Remember Christ's bloodshedding, by the which most holy sprinkling of all your sins you have free pardon.' And in like manner before dealing of the holy bread, these words, 'Of Christ's body this is a token, which on the cross for our sins was broken; wherefore of His death if you will be partakers, of vice and sin you must be forsakers.' And the clerk in like manner shall bring down the pax, and standing without the ch. door, shall say boldly to the people these words: 'This is a token of joyful peace, which is betwixt God and men's conscience; Christ alone is the peacemaker, which straitly commands peace between brother and brother.' And so long as ye use these ceremonies, so long ye use these significations" (Cardwell, DA, I 56).

The last words indicate the transition to a new era of regulation. But before dealing with this it may be well to present for comparison a summary enumeration of three groups of ceremonies still retained under Henry 8.

72. Ceremonies under Henry VIII.

(i) Baptismal Ceremonial: approved and explained c. 1540-1543 (Rationale of Ceremonial, ed. 1910). 1° + on forehead. 2° + on breast. 3° Salt in mouth. 4° + again on forehead. 5° Spit on nostrils and ears. 6° + on right hand. 7° Welcome by taking right hand. 8° Unction on breast. 9° Unction between shoulders behind. 10° Immersion or affusion. 11° Unction with chrism. 12° Putting on of the Chrism. 13° Setting a candle light in the right hand.

(ii) Eucharistic Ceremonial: noted in detail in Sar. Missal (CANON OF THE LITURGY, § 2), or in Becon's description (§ 73 ff. below); gen. approved and partially explained c. 1540-1543. 14° + + on forehead and breast. 15° Kiss of peace (Sar. 14). 16° Kissing of altar. 17° + on or over altar. 18° Incense placed in censer and blessed. 19° Use of (? Gospel) candle. 20° People stand. 21° People bow at the Holy Name. 22° People + after Gospel. 23° Kissing of book. 24° Censing of altar after Creed. 25° Making of chalice. 26° Placing of elements on altar. 27° Elevation of the same. 28° Kissing of paten. 29° Censing of paten and chalice. 30° Washing of hands. 31° Censing of altar. 32° Kissing of altar. 33° + over altar. 34° Kissing of missal after Sanctus. 35° Kissing of altar. 36° + + + over elements. 37° + + + + over elements. 38° + at benedixit. 39° Touching of host. 40° Elevation of host. 41° Ringing of sacring bell. 42° + at second benedixit. 43° Breathing over chalice. 44° Taking up of chalice. 45° Elevation of chalice. 46° Covering of chalice. 47° + + + + over host and chalice. 48° Kissing of altar. 49° + + + over bread, and chalice, and face. 50° Smiting of breast. 51° + + + over chalice. 52° + + + + with host ('second sacring'). 53° Kissing of paten (after Paternoster). 54° + + on forehead and breast. 55° Fraction of host in three parts. 56° + + + with third fragment within chalice. 57° Commixtio. 58° Kissing of pax. 59° + on receiving the Body. 60° + on receiving the Blood. 61° First and second ablutions. 62° Washing of hands. 63° Completion of ablutions. 64° + on face. 65° + on forehead. 66° At least one light upon the altar.¹

(iii) Additional Ceremonies: approved and explained c. 1540-1543. 67° Bearing candles on Candlemas Day. 68° Giving of ashes upon Ash-Wednesday. 69° Covering of the cross and images in Lent. 70° Bearing of palms on Palm Sunday. 71° Tenebrae lights put out in order after lessons. 72° Hallowing of oil and chrism on Maundy Thursday. 73° Washing of altars on the same day. 74° Creeping to the Cross on Good Friday. 75° Setting up Christ's sepulchre. 76° Paschal candle. 77° Hallowing of the Font on Easter Even. 78° General Processions. 79° Holy water. 80° Holy bread.

Sections i and iii are not difficult to follow, but Section ii, on Euch. ceremonial, requires the relevant details to be given meaning and connection by a consecutive description. This is here supplied from the polemical treatises of Cranmer's chaplain, Thomas Becon. Dr. Wickham Legg has testified to the general accuracy of the report, which, though aimed at Marian usage, serves our purpose, for Mary restored the religion of the last year of Henry 8. It has, of course, been necessary to relieve the reprint from a heavy load of unsavoury controversial padding, such as to deter all but resolute readers of the original.

1554. Becon, Displaying of the Popish Mass (PS. 3 261 f., 257 ff.): "First ye come solemnly forth in your gay . . . garments.

73. Ceremonial of the Mass. . . . Ye come unto the altar with your mass-book, corporas, chalice, and bread, with such other trinkets. Now standing before the altar, after ye have crossed yourselves upon your forehead and breast . . . ye say the Confiteor, and . . . after ye have made your confession to God and to our Lady, and to all the holy company of heaven, and have given yourself absolution. . . . ye approach to the altar, and making a cross upon it, ye kiss it. . . . When ye have stand awhile at the lower end [i.e., south] of the altar, saying the Introite, or office of the mass, as they call it, the Kyries, the Gloria in excelsis,¹ the collects, the epistle, the gradual, the alleluia, the tract, or the sequence, and all in Latin . . . ye remove . . . from one end of the altar to the other, and . . . take up the mass-book in your hands. . . . And . . . ye have a candle lighted. . . . Besides this . . . ye pray to God . . . on this manner: Jube me, Domine, benedicere . . . and answer in this manner: Dominus sit in corde meo et in ore meo, ad annuntiandum populo sanctum evangelium Dei. . . . And the . . . simple souls solemnly stand up and give good ear . . . but all in vain: for they learn nothing. Only when ye rehearse the name of Jesus, they learn to make solemn courtesy, and so, a piece of the gospel being once read, they stroke themselves on the head, and kiss the nail of their right thumb [i.e., cross themselves], and sit down again. . . . And ye yourselves . . . kiss the book, and turn you [the gospel having been read facing north] to the people, and say Dominus vobiscum. . . .² "The gospel ended (p. 264) with another kiss upon the book, ye say the creed. . . . After the creed, upon solemn feasts, ye use to cense the altar.

"These things done with all solemnity, ye turn you again unto the ch. . . . and so bidding them God speed, ye turn again to the altar, and . . . then do ye say your offertory. . . . After the offertory is said, ye take the chalice up in your hands, with the little round cake lying upon the grating or cover of the chalice, and lifting up your eyes, ye pray in this manner, Take, O holy Trinity, this oblation, which I . . . offer . . . for the salvation of the living, and for the rest . . . of all the faithful that are dead. Ah, who ever heard of such a sacrifice or oblation? A wafer-cake, which is yet mere bread, and no sacrament, and a chalice with a spoonful of wine mingled with two or three drops of water to be offered for the salvation of the living and . . . dead! . . . After that your prayer, ye set your chalice down again, saying these words: Acceptum sit omnipotenti Deo hoc sacrificium novum. . . . When ye have thus . . . offered, ye (go) to altar's end, and wash your hands. . . . Ye return to the altar holding your hands before you and mannerly bowing yourselves . . . ye make a cross upon the altar and kiss it . . .

² "And this is also to be noted, that, when Christ came in his own usual apparel unto the table, he did not kneel, as the papists do, nor yet stand, as the Jews did in the old law, but he sat down at the table . . . Christ sat, but ye some time stand right up, some time lean upon your elbows, sometime crouch downward, sometime kneel; but sit do ye never . . . and although gestures in this behalf seem after some men's judgment to be indifferent, yet the nearer we come to Christ's order, the better it is."

and then . . . ye turn yourselves, looking down to the people, and saying, Orate pro me, fratres et sorores, when many times there is nobody in the church but the boy that helpeth you to say mass; and so, making solemn courtesy, ye return unto your accustomed patterings. What ye say, no man can tell. For now come in your subtle secrets (i.e., Secreta). . . . Ye brast out into open words and exhort the people to lift up their hearts to God, and to consider the mysteries that are now in hand, and to be thankful to God for the benefits of their redemption. Ah, would God ye so speak the words that the people might be edified by them [i.e., in English]! . . . Immediately followeth the preface, . . . (and) the Sanctus, which, lifting up your hands, ye speak with a loud voice; and that ended ye kiss the mass-book.

"Now cometh in your holy mass-canon, whereof be divers authors . . . and here begin ye wonderfully to cross and to pray for the universal Ch. . . ."

75. The Canon. "Now (p. 269) let us behold your consecration. Taking the little cake in your hands, ye say these words, The day before he suffered. . . . When ye rehearse this word, benedixit . . . ye cross and bless the bread. . . . Again, those words which Christ spake openly to his disciples . . . ye partly leave out, and partly whisper . . . to yourselves. . . . After ye have once spoken these five words, Hoc est enim corpus meum, over the bread, and have . . . breathed . . . upon it, ye kneel down to it and worship it . . . and afterward ye hold it above your . . . heads. . . . The people believe that bread which the priest heaveth above his head to be Christ, perfect God and perfect man. Therefore kneel they down to it, knock their breasts, lift up their hands, worship and honour it. When the bell once rings (if they cannot conveniently see), they forsake their seats, and run from altar to altar, from sacring to sacring . . . gazing at that thing which the . . . priest holdeth up in his hands. And if the priest be weak in the arms, and heave not up high enough, the rude people of the country in divers parts of England will cry out to the priest: "Hold up, Sir John, hold up; heave it a little higher." And one will say to other: "Stoop down, thou fellow afore, for I cannot be merry except I see my Lord God once in a day." After . . . ye fall in hand to consecrate the wine with these words, In like manner. . . . Ye breathe . . . and shake your head over the chalice; and then ye kneel down, lift up your hands, and honour it. . . . After that ye stand up . . . and taking the chalice in your hands, ye hold it up with heave and hoave above your . . . heads, that the people also may worship it. This done, ye set the chalice down again upon the altar, and ye cover it with your corporass-cloth. . . . Then once again kneel ye down, and up again . . . and kiss the altar, and spread your arms abroad. . . . After all these things . . . ye fall again to your solemn prayers, and among all others . . . for the souls departed. . . What shall I speak of [the moving of the host] about the chalice, which followeth the praying for the dead? That is so holy a thing that it is called the second sacring, and may by no means be left undone. . . . After that . . . ye say your Pater-noster; that done, ye take up the patine off the chalice, and kiss it, and afterward ye cross yourselves withal both upon your breasts and upon your crowns, and lay it down again. . . . Ye strike up your sleeves, ye uncover the chalice, ye lay down the corporass-cloth . . . ye (p. 267) break your host . . . in three parts, holding over the chalice while ye break it. . . . Two pieces ye keep still in your hands . . . and the third ye let fall down into the chalice. . . .

Then do ye say the Agnus. . . Shortly after the Agnus ye kiss the pax. . . . And while the boy or parish-clerk carrieth the pax about, ye yourselves alone eat up all and drink up all. . . . When the boy or parish-clerk cometh again with the pax, ye hold forth your chalice for a little more . . . and when ye have drunken up that . . . yet once again to have a little more. . . . Ye go to the altar's end [i.e., to the lavabo], and there once again ye wash your hands. . . . After this ye return to the altar [and complete the ablutions]; and taking up your book in your hand, ye come again to the altar's end [i.e., south], where ye began your . . . mass. . . . After a few collects . . . ye turn to the people and say, Dominus vobiscum, bidding them adieu; and with Ite missa est, ye bid them go home, and tell them mass is done. . . . Then fall ye once again to kneeling down at the altar . . . and, because ye are our Lady's knights, ye salute her most humbly with some devout orison. That done, ye rise up again, and, saying the beginning of St. John's Gospel, ye bless you and cross you. . . . After all these things ye . . . shut your book, ye fold up your corporass-cloth, ye wind up your chalice, ye put off your . . . vestment, your stole, your fannel, your girdle, your alb, and your amice; ye put out the candle, and solemnly making courtesy . . . ye [depart] out of the church. . . . I pass over . . . your inclinations and prostrations . . . your elevations and extensions, your incurvations and genuflexions, etc."

II. In the Edwardian period, explanation was exchanged for Reduction. Partly this was effected by administrative orders under the powers of the R. Supremacy, directly forbidding ceremonies. Most of those in section iii of § 72 above were in this way abolished.

77. Period of

The R. Injns. of 1547 restricted the ceremonial use of lights to "two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament," and tolerated certain ceremonies "as yet not abrogated," the abuse of which was at the same time forbidden in detail, i.e., holy water, bread, bells, and candle. The Homily "Of good works" by Cranmer, authorised by the 32nd Injn., had already warned against "papistical superstitions and abuses, as . . . of hallowed beads, bells, bread, water, palms candles, fire, and such other." Abrogation of an explicit sort quickly followed. In Jan., 1548, Candlemas candles, ashes, and palms were abolished by an Order in Council, enforced by Cranmer in a letter to the bps., and in Feb., 1548, the prohibition was extended to creeping to the Cross, and the use of holy bread and water (Wilkins, Conc. 422, 21; and see, for an account of these ceremonies, VAl 2 185 n.).

But the principal instrument of reduction was the PB of 1549. In particular, the elaborate ceremonial described above as attendant upon the administration of Bapt. and HC remained to be dealt with in it. Still, in the OHC of 1548 (above § 36, H17 n. 1), it was ordered that HC should be celebrated "without the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass (until other order shall be provided)," except so far as should be necessary to ensure communion in both kinds, and with the single added restriction that any second or third consecration of the chalice should be "without any levation or lifting up" (§ 37, H2^a, n. 12). When "other order" was shortly afterwards "provided" in the First PB, the long note about ceremonies, which now is numbered 4 (§ 19, above), came at the end as No. 14. It assumes as an obvious fact, only needing justification as policy, that "some of the accustomed ceremonies be put away, and some retained and kept still" (B3^a). The sentences following imply further that a drastic reduction had been made in the burdensome number of ceremonies, and refer to "the abolishment of certain ceremonies."

78. Effect of

Yet, when we examine the rubrics and directions, we find that explicit prohibitions in regard to ceremonial are conspicuous by their absence: e.g., there are none in Bapt. and only two in HC, "without any elevation or showing the Sacrament to the people" (H2^a, n. 6), and "the bread . . . without all manner of print" (H5^a, n. 1). On the other hand, it is claimed that, "by this order, the curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book and the Bible," and steps were forthwith taken to get rid of all the old service-books (cp. HISTORY OF PB, § 7). The conclusion drawn by Cardwell, Dixon, and the majority of writers is accepted in OCM, where it is thus expressed, "The general method of abolishing a ceremony or ornament previously used appears to have been by the omission of any reference to them in the prs. and rubrics of that book."¹

To this conclusion Frere (Rel. Cer., pp. 209 ff.) offers an alternative, based on the admitted fact that "when the priest was so

or

minded, the new English service to the outward eye looked almost identical with the old Latin service. So far as the rubrics were concerned, this was perfectly justified." But (1) there is no evidence that any Ordinary gave overt sanction to this usage, and (2) the same writer himself points out (as quoted in ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 2 n.) that "a rubric . . . never is complete"; and it is quite arbitrary to take the 1549 rubrics apart from the Act on which they rested for authority (and this commanded the use of the services in such manner and form as is mentioned in the said book, and none other or otherwise, cp. RITUAL LAW, § 2), or apart from the administrative action which enforced the implicit prohibition (cp. ib., § 6). The latter can hardly be accounted for as action by the bps., which, though "defensible," "tended to restrict the liberty which the PB allowed."

¹ Cp. the words of the 1549 Act, which define its scope as limited to "altering those things which be altered and retaining those things which are retained in the said book," and set forth the "gains that would ensue upon the one and uniform rite and order in such common pr. and rites and external ceremonies."

We have here reached the crucial point in regard to the ceremonial of the PB. For the construction of later PBs involves no new principle. It may be well, therefore, to quote further from OCM, pp. 60 f., where the Five Bps. who elsewhere agree in the main with Dr. Frere, support their differing conclusion in this way.

80. Five Bps.
Conclusion.

"For a large number of [the usages or ceremonies] previously in use no direction is given, and the obvious intention of the compilers . . . is that these should not be continued. This appears clearly in the Bapt. Office, and in the Benediction of the Font. In these services some of the ancient ceremonies were expressly ordered, e.g., the use of the Chrisom and of anointing; of others, as the giving of salt (in the order of making Catechumens), the placing of the lighted taper in the hand of the baptised or of the sponsors, the placing of wax and oil in the water, there is no mention whatever. It can scarcely be seriously urged that the use of these together with the words accompanying the ceremonial act was intended to be permitted, though not obligatory, for any such contention would land us in the difficulty that there would be a certain number of permissible ceremonies and ornaments, for the use of which the priest was left without any directions whatever. Traditional knowledge might fairly be regarded as sufficient to show him the method of performing some acts which he was told in general terms to do, but for the performance of such ceremonial acts as those referred to above something more would be needed. They could hardly be continued without some written authority." It is added that the title Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained, is borne out by the section, which "throughout speaks only of two classes, . . . leaving no room for a third class, those permitted, but not enjoined."

Comparing the First PB with the Summary, we find that five out of thirteen Bapt. ceremonies are retained, i.e., 1°, 2°, 10°, 12°, 11°. The Euch. ceremonial is in like measure simplified. Two crossings only are enjoined in place of the Sarum twenty-five.¹ Two directions to kneel replace five or six notes about bowing or kneeling. The kissings of book,

of Reduction.

altar, fellow-min., or pax (ten in all), are omitted. The three elevations are gone. The washing of hands is appointed at neither of the accustomed places. The making of the chalice and setting of the elements on the altar (25°, 26°) remain; the priest now "must take the bread into his hands," instead of merely touching it (30°); the sacring bell (41°) had been forbidden by the R. Injns. of 1547; the taking of the cup is as before (44°). To sum up, after subtracting the few directions as to POSITION AND POSTURE, the parallels to which in the older use were not reckoned in the enumeration, there remain four out of fifty-three distinct ceremonial acts (each group of crossings counting as one). See further, RITUAL LAW, § 6, for evidence from the diocese of London and elsewhere as to the bearing of the First PB on ceremonial.¹

Further reduction took place in 1552. Three out of the five Bapt. ceremonies retained in 1549 (signing on the breast, unction, and putting on of the Chrisom) were dropped, as was the signing at Confirmation. The making of the chalice and the placing of the elements on the Lord's Table at the offertory, the two crossings, and the manual acts, were omitted (the last, perhaps, because it was so difficult otherwise to prevent elevation; but the customary use probably never wholly ceased). Administration at the Communion was to be "in their hands" (H2⁹), and no longer "in their mouths" (H5⁸, n. 4). And the note giving discretion as to gestures (D⁸) was left out.

It is admitted (E. Geldart in Case for Incense, p. 134) that "the silence as to lights, incense, and gestures (crossing, etc.), does not imply approval, but rather the fact of all such things (or nearly all) having ceased between 1550 and 1552." But the writer does not adopt the natural inference that the disuse of these ceremonial practices was the direct and intended result of the silence of the First PB.

III. After the return to the Henrician usages under Q. Mary, the 1552 book was reintroduced, without any change in regard to ceremonial. (The contention that the proviso about the Ornaments of the Ch. can be construed as covering ceremonial which would not otherwise be legal is considered further below.) The return of the exiles from Switzerland and Germany created a strong party, out of which the PURITANS presently grew up, who opposed even the modest residuum of ceremonies and ornaments that had been left from the rich profusion of the mediæval Uses. For some years there was no general attempt to secure a bare conformity with the explicit directions of the PB. Then, in 1566, the issue of the Advts. (see

and

¹ Frere (Rel. Cer., p. 217) notes certain directions of Ridley and Hooper, as contravening rubrics. But Ridley's prohibition of the Min. "saying the Agnus before the Communion" does not contravene the rubric that "in the Communion time, the clerks shall sing" the same words, as the distinction drawn in the Lincoln Judgment shows; and his direction to give out a notice about the novel arrangement of the poor men's box is an obviously proper episcopal Injn. in regard to one of those notices which for the most part remained subject to extra-rubrical regulation till 1662, and are still variable at the discretion of the Ordinary. Even Hooper's Injn., "that the Min. in the use of the Communion and prs. thereof turn his face towards the people," may be taken as subject to the implied qualification, "when the contrary is not clearly specified."

RITUAL LAW, § 22) marked a decisive change. The policy of enforcement of the PB was resolutely pursued under Whitgift, and finally, in 1604, Bancroft secured the adoption of the CANONS, though they never received Parliamentary authorisation. Canon 14 required that "all mins. . . shall observe the Orders, Rites, and Ceremonies prescribed in the BCP. . . without either diminishing in respect of preaching, or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof."

Only one ceremonial addition from unbroken custom finds place in the Canons, i.e., the direction in canon 18 to bow "when in time of Divine Service the name of the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned . . . as it hath been accustomed." It is doubtful whether the custom here sanctioned extended beyond the Creeds and the Gospel, when the people were standing up and so could conveniently bow; and conformity to the custom is only general at the Creeds. But its inclusion marks the beginning of a period of ceremonial revival under James I and Charles I, of which a sympathetic account is given in Frere's Rel. Cer., pp. 219-229. With hardly an exception the novelties introduced fall within the wide limits of variation left by the rubrics, though as novelties they excited not a little disturbance.

As exceptions we may consider (a) the washing of hands at the offertory, (b) the manual acts, and (c) the solemn offering of alms and bringing in of the elements from the credence at the offertory. "Those three seem to me to be the strongest cases of additional ceremonies which were allowed under episcopal sanction," said Dr. Frere before the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. (Q. 2116). Of these, (a) may perhaps be justified as a legitimate usage in the interests of decency, if unobtrusively performed; (b) would appear to be a technical illegality, reasonable now that so long had elapsed since any abuse had been connected with them; and (c) could be explained as seemingly ways of doing what had to be done somehow and at some time, while no method or time was prescribed. The direction to stand at the Nicene Creed was an obvious analogical extension of the rule for the Apostles' Creed. The practice of turning to the East for the Creeds, and of making reverences to the altar, may have been let pass on the principle, De minimis non curat lex.

IV. At the revision of 1661 the general position as to ceremonial was firmly maintained as against the Puritans, and a number of points of approved custom were now made obligatory. Standing is ordered for Gospel and Creed; the alms are to be solemnly presented; the elements, though not ordered to be offered, are to be placed on the Table at the offertory; the manual acts are enjoined, a new FRACTION at consecration replacing the Sarum use after consecration; provision is made for a second consecration,¹ for the covering of the consecrated elements, and for the reverent consumption of what might remain.

84. Maintenance and Extension.

¹ The notorious case of Robert Johnson, in 1574, hardly deserves the attention it has received. With a crass literalism he pleaded the lack of rubrical direction as excuse for having administered unconsecrated wine. The Court held that the PB order to consecrate and administer must be held to apply as often as necessity might require.

Again followed a long time of decay in care for ceremonial, the revival being due to the Tractarian movement. For a clear account of the developments during the three periods beginning 1840, 1866, and 1892, reference may be made to the Report of the Eccles. Disc. Com. (pp. 55-64), where the very full evidence of Abp. Davidson is summarised in a Historical Survey.

Several distinct streams of tendency can be distinguished as interacting within the Eng. Ch. during the last century, and as still active.

(1) There is the purely conservative tendency, wedded to the particular usage that happens to be familiar. This powerful force we have always with us. And it is sometimes overmuch disparaged. Even an inferior type of ceremonial may be consecrated by the ingenuous acceptance of generations of good men.

(2) The second tendency, bent on the scrupulous observance of rubrics, while it may be honourable in aim, may be divisive and demoralising in effect, if allowed unrestricted exercise. Custom is second law, and is regarded as having an almost sacred authority in matters of religion. Hence, the transition from traditional conformity to unrubrical custom to a willing and, therefore, edifying adoption of lawful ceremonial long disused, can only be achieved by a parish, or even by a congregation, under very wise, loving, and patient leadership. The Tractarians limited their aim to the observance of positive PB directions.

(3) A later school has taken for its watchword a sentence in canon 30. "So far was it from the purpose of the Ch. of Eng. to forsake and reject the Chs. of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like Chs., in all things which they held and practised, that, as the Apology of the Ch. of Eng. confesseth, it doth with reverence retain those ceremonies, which doth neither endamage the Ch. of God, nor offend the minds of sober men; and only departed from them in those particular points, wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity, and from the Apostolical Chs. which were their first founders." But, in their devotion to Catholic unity, they interpret this as giving them the right to claim any ceremonies, which in their opinion do not come under the exclusions in the last clauses, as still lawful in the Ch. of Eng.,¹ and as, indeed, morally obligatory, so that (according to some counsellors) they must be persisted in even against the express injn. of the bp. of the diocese. Some of these are most affected by the desire for unity with the mediæval Ch. of Eng., and others feel more strongly the obligation of unity with the continental Chs. in communion with Rome.

(4) There is an antiquarian tendency, which lingers lovingly over the old just because it is old, and can so identify itself with the life of the past that the strangeness of that past on the side of manners and customs is forgotten.

(5) There is an æsthetic tendency, which rebels against the dulness and ugliness of common life, and seeks to enrich worship with all profusion of ceremonial and decorative beauty and splendour.

(6) There is a congregational tendency, which impels a body of worshippers either to remain contentedly below the average level of decent ceremonial, or to press on to a stage of elaboration almost out of recognition by the ordinary Ch. layman as based on the PB.

(7) There is a Puritan tendency, strong amongst many Churchmen, which feels all elaboration of the outward as a kind of treason to the inward, and is profoundly suspicious of any condescension to the material, out of a watchful jealousy for the spiritual. Legalism and formalism are, for these, the inevitable goal of ceremonial elaboration.

Any ceremonial system, providing for a Ch. within whose bosom so many cross-currents of tendency are moving, must be a compromise, but it need not be on the one hand so rigid, nor on the other so brittle, as our PB order has become under the warping and weathering lapse of years.

One view which we have been examining is that all possible fullness of ancient (or contemporary Catholic) ceremonial, which is not explicitly or implicitly contradicted or forbidden by the PB itself, is of moral and canonical obligation. But, then, what ceremonies did the PB abolish? and where is our rule? The answer virtually is that the uniformity aimed at was one of rite but not of ceremony. Only the suggestion has no valid evidence behind it. The other view, as adopted in OCM, may be summarised thus. Nothing is of binding obligation under penalty but what is mentioned in the PB or necessarily required by it, and nothing is allowed which is not at least permissible by reasonable implication or analogy. Any decent and convenient way of obeying rubrical directions is legitimate, but ceteris paribus the old is best.

A few points remain to be cleared up.

i. The interpretation of the alternative say or sing is not obvious, and is complicated by the intermittent occurrence of the terms read, repeat, and use. The last two words, however, are general; and read, being applied to parts which may be said or sung (e.g., D2¹), is also indeterminate. Goode (On Eng. Ch. Ceremonial, 1851, pp. 20 ff.), arguing from Burnet's account of the Vis. in 1549 (2 189), and from the 49th Injn. of 1559, concludes that the natural voice was required for the prs., except in chs. where there were endowed choirs. But the present rubrics give no hint of any restriction upon the discretionary alternative, and even the reference to the Anthem has not been by custom interpreted as restrictive. At least the caution may be ventured that the right to monotone or intone is not also a sacred duty (cp. D1², n. || 'shall read').

Jebb (in Stephens' BCP with Notes, 1849, pp. 541 ff.) discusses the matter fully and clearly, with the following results. Say may mean generally any kind of recitation, with the natural voice, in a monotone, or with musical inflexion; it may also be contrasted with certain modes of singing as in the phrase sung or said. Sing also may mean (1) recitation in a musical tone, (2) chanting, or (3) anthem-wise singing; and only (2) and (3) are alternative to say. Say is used of exhs., confessions, prs., versicles, sentences, ps., but by itself does not exclude singing, since the Nicene Creed, which may always be sung, is in one rubric included among what is to be said (H5¹). "The phrases sung or said or said or sung specify those parts of the service only, in which, when said, the min. has a distinctive part, whether (1) leading or preceding the people in each clause, or (2) reciting alternate verses with them, or (3) reciting the passage alone; but which, when sung, are sung by the min. and people, or choir altogether, without any distinctive part being assigned to him.

... They never apply to those parts of the service which are always to be repeated by the min. alone in the V, and by the people in the R." Examining the various cases, they group themselves, as just explained, thus: (1) The Nicene Cr., Sandus, and Gloria in excelsis, when sung, are performed like Anthems, while this option has never been exercised for the Apostles' Creed. (2) The Pss., Easter Anthem, QV., and Canticles are pointed for choral recitation, and, when they are sung, the min. sings with others. So the Lit. belongs to this class; for, as commonly rendered by one min. with sung Rs, it is properly termed said, and is only sung when two chanters, who need not be in orders, sing the Vs up to the Lord's Pr. exclusive (cp. F¹, n. ||), and parts afterwards. (3) The sent., anthems, and "I heard a voice" in Bur. are either read by the min. alone or performed like anthems ("the Priest shall say, or the Priest and Clerks shall sing," 04). Veni Creator, when read, should be said by Bp. and people alternately, and, when sung, should be begun by the Bp., and taken up antiphonally like the Pss.; but it is often sung to an anthem setting.

ii. Certain parts of the service are clearly appointed to be said by both clergy and people. These are the Confessions, Apostles' and Nicene Creeds (unless the latter be sung), and the closing pr in the Comm. Probably the original intention was for the min. to say each clause separately, followed by the people (as in the Cath. use of the Confession at MEP), the clauses being indicated by initial capitals. By custom the min. now usually only begins the first clause or part of it by himself, the rest being said all together. But (a) the min. should lead throughout in a clear voice, which the choir should not drown, and (b) the clauses should be well marked, and the words said at such a rate that all can recite them simultaneously as with one voice and one heart. It would appear that the Lord's Pr., the words of which might be assumed to be known, was intended to be said by all together; also that the customary recitation of the 1st Lord's Pr. at HC by the Priest alone, and the occasional recitation of it at Confirm. by the Bp. alone, are both contraventions of the explicit rubric D2¹.

Certain other parts are also by custom said jointly, i.e., Sandus, Gloria in excelsis, and first Thanksgiving at Bapt. (I3², n. ||); and (in some chs.) the General Thanksgiving. In each case the absence of the initial capitals marking the subdivided clauses, and the presence of the italic Amen, are good evidence that they were meant to be said by the min. alone. For the first two, cp. § 87 (3).

iii. The rubrics of the present PB are for the most part drawn up to suit the majority of chs., in which there is usually only one min., the

80. Assistant Ministers. Curate of the parish. There are, however, certain indications that both lay and clerical assistants may take part in the services besides the principal officiant. The reading of the Lessons (D2², n. ||, he that readeth), and Ep. (H1⁴, n. ||), the singing of the Lit. (F1², n. ||) and other sung parts of the service (§ 87 above), and the making of the Confession in the name of the people (H2², n. ||) are all instances where lay persons may lead in the service, besides the responsive and accompanying part assigned to the people. Similarly, the right of the deacon to read the Gospel is expressly included in the formula of ordination (T1¹⁵, n. ||) and otherwise to assist the Priest in Divine Service (T1¹¹). On principal feast-days canon 24 requires at HC the assistance of "Gospeller and Epistler" "in all cath. and collegiate chs.," and such assistance is by analogy lawful in other chs. In the absence of any Consuetudinary to direct the nature and mode of the assistance to be rendered by such, numerous unauthorised ritual directories have appeared, providing supplements to the rubrics from ancient and modern sources. These have not, however, confined themselves to regulating what can fairly be called "assistance," but have usually specified a number of additional ceremonial acts, movements, and gestures; and, further, their tone has often been that of injunction rather than of counsel. An authorised companion to the rubrics, indicating approved ways of rendering Common Pr., the Sacrs., and other rites and ceremonies of the Ch., according to the use of the Ch. of Eng., would be welcomed by many, if the italicised words were loyally and reasonably followed.

From the references to the CLERK or Clerks, and the customary ceremonial of vergers, the conclusion has been widely drawn that, besides the choir, organist, bellringers, vergers, and assistant-vergers, it is lawful to employ boys, lads, and young men to assist in different parts of the ceremonial. Subject to the regulation of the Bp., and to the canons of good taste, convenience, and edification, such employment in suitable cases would appear consonant with the PB, provided that the ceremonial acts entrusted to them were in themselves lawful. Dr. Frere, Rel. Cer., c. 3, argues in favour of a considerable extension of such ministerial co-operation.—R2, q.

VII. RITUAL ORNAMENTS AND ADJUNCTS.

The third department of R. is concerned with Ornaments. This expression, in its narrower and technical sense, is confined to 90. Scope. arts. used in the services (see ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 6, 2°); but the distinction is an artificial one, and so this section will also refer to other external adjuncts of worship. Some of these are necessary for the due rendering of the Common Pr. (e.g., Books), or for the administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Ch. (e.g., LORD'S TABLE, CHALICE, FONT); some are convenient (e.g., PULPIT, PEWS, CUPBOARDS); some are indicative of office, status, or function (e.g., warden's wand, verger's gown and mace, graduate's hood); some are honorific or merely "decent" and seemly (e.g., PASTORAL STAFF, stained GLASS).

All of them have their relation to art. They are concerned with the expression of Religion.

91. Relation to Art. Even the humblest of them is a part of a precious whole, and should therefore not be ugly or tawdry or incongruous, but rather help to reinforce the general impression of ordered dignity and beauty which the House of God, and its solemnities, should convey to the soul.

It is hard either to learn or to teach the value of Art, in our divided life, confused and distracted by the mass of products of an activity purely utilitarian. Division of labour is a practical necessity: but a divorce between the spiritual faculties which are all necessary for the perfect life of man is a disastrous blunder. In primitive and classical stages of civilisation art and life were inseparable, as, indeed, strictly speaking, they always are. Every vulgar and conventional talker is an artist in words, a poet or maker of a sort. The jerry-builder is an architect after a fashion, i.e., an artist in houses. And so with the rest. But, just so far as the end of the talker or builder is merely practical, the art is so bad that it seems like a perversion to apply the term to their unattractive and conventional productions. See further, ARTS AND CRAFTS for the essential and historical relation of religion to beauty.

The PB, first of all, assumes the provision of an ordered series of buildings for worship, cath., collegiate and parish chs., and parochial and private chapels. A ch. is a shelter for worshippers, large enough to accommodate the members likely to use it, and therefore very large in the case of central or cath. chs., and built substantially because serving no temporary purpose, but a permanent need. A barn or a drill-shed may be used for worship, but our great heritage of eccles. buildings has arisen from the belief, sometimes instinctive, and sometimes reasoned out, that the house of God should not be a mere convenience, a clever practical contrivance, but a monument of independent value, a visible testimony to the supremacy of the unseen and therefore an artistic whole, a complex work embodying unity and harmony of design—in a word, the revelation to others of a vision of beauty discerned by the trained and illumined eye of the true architect.

Practical and historical aspects of our Eng. chs. are treated under CHURCH (BUILDING OF) and ARCHITECTURE. Here we have to note how the general rules of R. policy laid down in §§ 6 ff. can be illustrated under this head. Ch. buildings do not seem to have been the subject of hard and fast eccles. regulations, but the consent and approval of the Bishop is implied in his exclusive right of consecration, and any subsequent alterations or additions are covered by the requirement of a FACULTY. Naturally, however, tradition favoured the adoption of similar structural forms to meet similar needs. It would take us too far to attempt to trace the connection between various beautiful features of our chs., and the conditions of structural stability or the demands of bodies of worshippers, to which they were originally due. But it is germane to our subject to show how, in spite of the absence of central regulation, the tendency towards a distinctive national use can be detected here, as well as in liturgical and ceremonial development.

In particular, it is of interest to note how many features, which later were marks of Eng. Gothic, can be illustrated by the remains of 92. National Characteristic. Celto-Saxon work, of which Repton crypt and Bradford-on-Avon ch. are good examples. 1°. They are comparatively long in proportion to breadth. The later Eng. chs. are, of course, the longest in the world. 2°. The square E. end has persisted, and the apse has never established itself as an Eng. characteristic, being indeed unknown in western districts. (The square E. ends of the northern French cath. of Laon and several neighbouring chs. are due to an early connection with the see of Lincoln.) 3°. The aggregation of separate compartments, most noticeable at Bradford-on-Avon (where this feature led to its long being unrecognised as a ch.), is repeated in the enclosed quires, and separate presbyteries or Lady chapels, in our cath. chs. 4°. The large side porches, due perhaps to our inclement western weather, making W. doorways unsuitable as usual means of access, are also repeated again and again in parish and cath. chs. The projecting transepts are another instance of the same exemplary feature. 5°. The single tower of defence, either at the W., or serving as the body of the ch., has given rise to the frequent W. tower in parish chs. (hardly ever seen in France), and to the central tower, making, with the side chambers of the main transept, the cruciform central towered type, which became the customary grouping for the greater chs. of the country. The central lantern tower was probably a Northern invention, and was intended to throw light down upon the high altar, an aim which was forgotten when, by the removal of the altar to the E. end, it was left to light an empty space.¹

This brief account of the tendency to a national architectural use may be concluded

94. English by a comparison between Eng. and French and French Gothic, specially as represented in the great cath. chs.

One feature of Gothic art is better illustrated, from historical causes, in France than in England, i.e., the intention of the Gothic builder to employ all the arts. At Rheims, for example, five forms of art are splendidly represented, architecture at its noblest, sculpture (two thousand faces, and groups unrivalled unless at Chartres), tapestry, glass, and goldsmith's work (plate and reliquaries), while for wood carving Amiens is supreme. That a like union of the arts is both desirable and possible in the present is abundantly established, in spite of much failure, by not a few encouraging examples. Of these, the new Liverpool Cath. Lady Chapel is perhaps the finest and most conspicuous achievement in this generation, glass, metal, embroidery, wood, and stone being compacted with rare skill into a harmonious whole of compelling dignity and beauty.—R.

The ch. as a whole, being dedicated to the whole of religious worship and not to any particular part of it, was accepted as essential; but

95. "Chancels one portion, the CHANCEL, was in shall remain." danger for a while. Under the First PB it was reserved at a certain point of HC (1118, n. 10) for min., clerks, and communicants, and Ridley had the gates locked at St.

Paul's, and veils drawn to seclude those within. But a considerable party, headed by Bucer and Hooper, advocated the abolition of chancels, the latter (Works 1492), in a Court sermon on Mar. 5, 1550, expressing his wish "that the magistrates should . . . shut up the partition (= portion partitioned off) called the chancel, that separateth the congregation of Christ one from the other." Greedy nobles and squires, on the look out for cheap building materials, backed up the plea, that they might get lead from the roof and stone from the walls. Cranmer and the revisers of 1552 resisted this pressure, which has, however, left its mark on the PB. Disputes having arisen as to the place of Divine service, they inserted this direction (D¹): "The MEP shall be used in such place of the Ch., Chapel, or Chancel, and the Min. shall so turn him, as the people may best hear. And if there be any controversy therein, the matter shall be referred to the ordinary, and he or his deputy shall appoint the place, and the Chancels shall remain, as they have done [i.e., remained] in times past." At the same time the above-noted direction of 1549 was necessarily omitted, because a new rubric (H¹) now provided that "The Table . . . shall stand in the body of the ch., or in the Chancel, where MEP are appointed to be said." The reason doubtless was that many chancels were too small for the purpose. There is good evidence of this in the direction in the draft Interpretations of 1561, "That the Table be removed out of the quire into the body of the ch., bef. the chancel door; where either the quire seemeth to be too little, or at great feasts of receivings." The rubric was modified without statutory authority in 1559 (cp. ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 7: 6°, and § 8, end of 1st par.), so as not to vary abruptly the use of "the accustomed place" for MEP. The chancel continued to be used for communicants, and R. Orders 1°–7° in 1561 (see RITUAL LAW, § 16) provided for the repair and equipment of chancels. So Bp. Wren understood the rubric as "meaning . . . that the chancels should not be demolished or defaced, but should be preserved for the use of the parish." At the 1661 revision the scribe of the Annexed Book put a full stop after the previous clause, and followed the printer's error in a 1636 copy used for the revision by omitting the comma in the middle, so that it now reads "And the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past." The Puritans had, however, made no comment on this clause, nor has any suggestion for its amendment been recorded. The meaning therefore remains the same, and in spite of the growing custom of using altar rails it was still usual for the communicants to kneel at benches in the chancel and for the Min. to pass among them at the administration. The meaning of the clause cannot in any case be (as has sometimes been suggested) that the ornaments and fittings of chancels shall be as they were in times past, for the wording is "remain as they have done," and that interpretation is at variance with history.

Ornaments that are merely decorations, and not used in the services, do not come under the

96. rubric, or the Acts of Uniformity, Decorations but are left to be dealt with and Fittings at discretion by the Ordinaries on application for a FACULTY; and it has been ruled that the undoubted fact of the destruction of images in the reigns of Edw. 6 and Eliz. does not necessitate their condemnation now, each case being judged on its merits and accepted or rejected according as it would not or would be likely to promote superstition. But a crucifix, or single figure of Christ on the cross, as distinct from a sculptured group, has been refused sanction, and, if proposed to be placed on the rood screen, would probably continue to be condemned.—R4.

Furniture and fittings of chs. come under the same rule, though minor replacements and additions, which do not involve alteration of the fabric, or interference with any use of the ch., do not require a faculty. These are sufficiently treated in the separate arts.—R5.

It is otherwise with those 'ornaments' which are used in the services. Like the former, these

97. Ornaments Proper (i.e., used). need to be carefully considered from the points of view of taste and cost. And it is one objection to a general levelling up in the direction of more numerous and expensive ornaments that it imposes a burden upon poor congregations which they cannot well bear, and tempts richer bodies of worshippers to spend disproportionately on externals, as compared with such causes as Home and Foreign Missions, or the maintenance of the ministry. But two other considerations arise in relation to Ornaments proper, (1) their relation to the rite, and (2) their associations.

(1) A moment's thought will show that Ornaments, and ceremonial acts generally, are more needed as

98. Function and Association. adjuncts to a rite rendered in a language not generally understood. Incense and banners, and crosses, and so forth, may, by viva voce explanation, be made edifying and intelligible elements for people present at a Latin service. At a vernacular service, when the words express the ideas intended to be conveyed, there is at least less necessity for the introduction of adventitious ornaments; and this has to be borne in mind when comparing the usage under the PB with what preceded it, or when discussing proposals for change in practice or in law.

At the same time, ornaments, by their steady silent appeal to the eye, have an influence upon worshippers which should neither be forgotten nor neglected. One of the most gifted and honoured of the pioneers of the ceremonial revival of the last cent., J. M. Neale (Hierologus, pp. ix-xiii), well expresses the aims of the movement. A sentence or two may be quoted.

"It is granted," he remarks, "that in themselves those 'ornaments of the Ch., and the Ministers thereof,' which it is now wished to re-introduce—copes, tapers, jewelled plate, rood-screens, deep chancels, sedilia, and the like—can conduce nothing to holiness, and, in so far as they do not, cannot please God. But in their effects, they may, with his blessing, do both. The poor, to whom the Gospel is preached, are much influenced by these outward and visible signs." He goes on to ask how they can believe in any "Real Presence of their Saviour . . . when month after month they behold the miserable deal table (loaded, except on Sunday, with hassocks), the ragged linen cloth, the battered pewter vessels, and the black bottle? . . . We do not say that a golden chalice and paten will of themselves lead any one to realise the awfulness of 'verily and indeed taking and receiving' the Body and Blood of his Saviour; but it will at least teach him that those who have provided them consider that Bread and that Wine as worthy of all reverence."

(2) An unmeaning ornament is clearly out of place in such a system of worship as the PB has from the first contemplated. But many ornaments, once merely convenient or honorific, have gathered about them associations which cannot be disregarded in an estimate of their expediency. The interesting description in OCM, pp. 33-39, of the symbolism of Liturgical Costume has little bearing on current controversies. The various crosses, combined to form the Union Jack, have each their history and early meaning, but Briton and Teuton know the famous flag now as a national symbol; and this later association of ideas is the dominant factor. So the famous "Six points" (Incense, Vestments, the Mixed Chalice, the Eastward Position, Lights, and Wafer bread) have been valued or reprobated precisely for their doctrinal associations. Those who so value them are, in regard to Euch. doctrine, on the side of Bonner and Gardiner, rather than with Cranmer and Ridley, though they neither adopt the mediæval definition of transubstantiation, nor claim to impose their doctrine as a term of communion on their fellow-Churchmen.

Perhaps the difference between the extremes is not so great as was thought in the 16th cent.,

99. Subject to Ch. Authority. but it is radical enough, and can only be lessened by patient, sympathetic and comprehensive study and thought. Meanwhile, two things are needed for a clear and practical grasp of the situation. (1) There must be an understanding that the matters of ceremonial in dispute are "altogether indifferent," to use the phrase of Peter Martyr.¹ No one of the six points, nor all of them, have a necessary connection with any distinctive doctrine of the Euch. (2) The Ch. of Eng. claims the right to regulate independently all such indifferent matters. And if, as a living body, acting through her constituted authorities, she were to impose upon all her clergy a clear injn. to adopt at HC either the use of 1549, alb with vestment or cope, or that of 1552, a surplice only, or were to re-promulgate the rule of the canons of 1604, she would be within her rights, even if it be admitted that in the present state of discipline such an order is at the moment impracticable. (3) Accepting these two points, the essential indifference of these externals, and the right of the living Ch. to take order about them by ¹ On Nov. 4, 1550, he answered Hooper's inquiry about the use of vestments thus. "This use I consider to be altogether indifferent, though I am not ignorant that those things which are indifferent can sometimes be used, but ought sometimes to be removed. . . . I do not think a diversity of vestments ought to be maintained in holy services, nevertheless I would by no means say it was ungodly. . . . If I were so persuaded I would never have communicated here [Oxford] with the Ch. of Eng., in which a diversity of this kind has been maintained to this day" (Gorham, Ref. Gleamings, p. 188).

whatever procedure is most convenient, we may with a calm mind investigate the legal and historical data which bear on the question. What order, in regard to each disputed point, has the Ch., overtly or covertly, imposed or accepted?

The stages of explanation and reduction, decay and revival, maintenance and extension, which were indicated above (§§ 71, 77, 83, 84) in relation to ceremonial generally, hold good in the main for ornaments in the ceremonial aspect of them which we are now considering.

A few illustrations may be given of the periods of explanation and reduction, down to 1550. The 2nd of the 1538 R. Injns. declared that "Images serve for no other purpose but as to be books of unlearned men"

100. Images and Lights

(a note constantly repeated in Bps.' Injns., etc.), and so "feigned images . . . abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto, ye shall . . . forthwith take down . . . and shall suffer from henceforth no candles, tapers or images of wax to be set before any picture, but only the light [= a row of lights] that commonly goeth across the ch. by the rood-loft, the light before the sacr. of the altar, and the light about the [Easter] sepulchre, which for the adorning of the ch. and divine service ye shall suffer to remain."

1538. Bp. Shaxton called in all relics, with documents alleged to prove their genuineness, that the false might be sifted out.

1547. The R. Injns. for Winchester Cath. (cp. York do., VAI 2 153) forbid anyone to "use from that time any manner cope of cloth" (cp. VAI 2 149, where it is noted that "the cloth cope, or capa nigra, was ordinarily worn over the surplice by the ecclesiastics at choir offices, except on occasions where, for special reasons, it was discarded, and they appeared in their surplices. This marks the disappearance of these from the choirs of the churches. The injn. does not touch the silk copes.") At St. George's, Windsor, the visitors were more explicit. They say (VAI 2 161), "whereas upon earnest request made unto us in other cath. churches within our progress, we have put down the wearing of black copes and scapulars and amyses of cloth, because it is thought to be a kind of monkery, we require you . . . that all . . . ministers of this ch. do surcease from using or wearing any black cope or scapular of cloth above their surplices." The "15 clerks laymen" were to "wear surplices in the choir." At Lincoln in 1548 the visitors were rather less strict, requiring only "that no minister . . . under the degree of a prebendary wear any habit or black hood above his surplice in the choir. Nor no prebendary but only his surplice and grey almuce."

In 1550 the graduate preachers of St. George's, Windsor, were ordered to get hoods "to wear in the choir and to preach with in this college." The clerks also were to wear gowns, to "come down beneath the calf of the leg, as your old statutes meant." This meant the compulsory use of the cassock by the lay singers who replaced the old clergy. Surplices had been required in 1547 (VAI 2 216). Ridley asks (VAI 2 235) "whether organs do play alway any part of the pr. or service," and Frere notes that the Venetian ambassadors' reports, with other vouchers, prove the continuance of organs, though many reformers disliked them, and some were removed. Ridley also includes "tabernacles" (i.e., Frere explains, not the modern sort, but coverings for the hanging pyx) among unlawful ornaments.

On Feb. 11, 1548 (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1 47), an Order in Council required that "all images remaining in any ch. or chapel" should be removed, the distinction between abused and innocent images being thus abolished. So Cranmer in the same year (VAI 2 177) inquires about "all images," etc.¹

101. All Images Condemned

The legal principle involved in Ch. ornaments is the same as in ceremonial. It has been twice stated (§ 80 above, and RITUAL LAW, § 4) in words quoted from the Report of the Five Bps.; and a third quotation will aptly summarise their judgment for our present context. "Those who compiled the PB [of 1549] did not contemplate the interpolation of additional ceremonies with appropriate 'ornaments' beyond those for which provision is actually made in the book; and thus any 'ornament' or article made use of must be honestly subsidiary to the service, and not used to introduce a new ceremony" (OCM, p. 61). A useful enumeration of ornaments is given (pp. 56 ff.) under the following classification:—(1) (a) mentioned or (b) implied in 1549 PB, (c) named in 1662 PB, (d) required by canons of 1604; (2) not mentioned or implied. Under the last heading the Pax, Censer, Bason, and Sacring bell are pronounced illegal, and the Processional Cross placed on a level with warden's wands and verger's maces or verges, a critical summary of evidence being given in each case.

A somewhat different procedure will be followed here. And, first, two lists of Henrician ornaments will be furnished. Both ostensibly relate to the reign of Mary, but, as the "religion of the last year" of Henry was then in force, they are relevant, and we owe it to the intervening period of change that either a Protestant controversialist or a Romanensian bp. should have occasion to enumerate ornaments so minutely. (The account of the Euch. vestments quoted from Becon under

102. Henrician Ornaments

¹ Cp. Cranmer's inquiry, no. 11, in 1548 (VAI 2 178).

ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 4, is drawn upon for these items.) These two lists are next supplemented by two further lists, of books confiscated by Parker in 1567, and of other ornaments condemned by Grindal in 1571.

(a) 1554. Becon, Comparison (Works, P.S. 3 362), describes how the Marian priest "hath 1 an altar sumptuously built, yea, and that is 2 covered with most fine and white linen cloths, 30 likewise 3 richly garnished, decked, and trimmed with divers gorgeous pictures and costly images. He hath also 4, 5 cruets for water and for wine, 6 towels, 7 coffers, 8 pixes, 9 phylacteries, 10 banners, 11 candlesticks, 12 wax candles, 13 organs, 14 ringing bells, 15 sacry bells, 16 chalice of silver and of gold, 17 patens, 18 censer, 19 ship, 20 frankincense, 21 altar-cloths, 22 curtains, 23 paxes, 24 basins, 25 ewers, 26 crosses, 27 chrismatory, 28 reliques, 29 jewels, ouches, precious stones, 30 mitres, 31 cross-staves, and many other such like ornaments."

(b) 1554. Bonner's arts.¹ "49° 1 Holy-water stock or pot having in it holy water; 51° 2 a pax . . . and the said pax in the ch. to be kissed by the priest and to be carried to the parishioners at Mass-time; 53° 3 a high altar of stone, consecrated and dedicated especially to say or sing Mass upon; 54° 4 a legend, 5 an antiphoner, 6 a grail, 7 a psalter, 8 an ordinal to say or solemnise divine office, 9 a missal, 10 a manual, 11 a processional [cp. BOOKS, LITURGICAL], 12 a chalice, 13, 14, two cruets, a principal vestment [ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 3] with 15 chasuble, 16, 17 vestment for the deacon and sub-deacon [i.e., dalmatic and tunicle], 18 a cope with the appurtenances, it is to wit, 19 an amice, 20 alb, 21 girdle, 22 stole, and 23 fannon [i.e., maniple], the high altar with 24 apparel in the front and other parts thereof, 25 three towels, 26 three surplices, 27 a rochet, 28 a cross for procession, 29 with candlesticks, 30 a cross for the dead, 31 an incenser, 32 a ship or vessel for frankincense, 33 a little sanctus bell, 34 a pix with an honest and decent cover, and 35 a veil for the Lent, 36 banners for the Rogation week, 37 bells and ropes, 38 bier for the dead, 39 a vessel to carry holy water about, 40 a candlestick for the paschal taper, 41 a font to christen children, 42 with covering and lock and key, and generally all other things which after the custom of the country or place, the parishioners are bound to find, maintain, and keep; 57° 43 a crucifix, 44 a rood-loft; 59° 45, 46 a chrismatory for holy oil and chrism [2 receptacles included]; 60° 47 seats and pews for the parishioners to sit in." (VAJ).

(c) Abp. Grindal, in 1571, ordered that "all 1 Vestments, 2 Albes, 3 Tunicles, 4 Stoles, 5 Phanons, 6 Pixes, 7 Paxes, 8 Hand-bells, 9 Sacring-bells, 10 Sencers, 11 Crismatories, 12 Crosses, 13 Candlesticks, 14 Holy-water stocks or Tables, 15 Images, and all other reliques and monuments of superstition and idolatry, be utterly defaced broken and destroyed." Observe that he said nothing about copes, as, since the Advts. of 1566, they could not be, as indeed they had not always before been, reckoned as "monuments of superstition."

(d) On Mar. 26, 1567, Abp. Parker ordered the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' to send up to him a number of old service-books, being "monuments of superstition, which by public orders and laws of this realm ought to be abolished as derogatory to the state of religion publicly received." The "Schedule" included "16 three mass-books, old and new, 17 two portuisses, 18 eight grailes, 19 seven antiphoners, of parchment and bound; 20 ten processional, old and new, 21 two hymnals, 22 an old manual of prayer; 23 an invitory book; 24 two psalters in (?) and one covered with a skin; 25 a great pricksong book of parchment; five others of paper, bound in parchment; 26 the founder's mass-book, in parchment, bound in board; in Mr. Mills's hand, 27 an antiphoner and a 28 legend; 29 a portuisse in his hand, in two vols., 30 a manual, 31 a mass-book, and 32 a processional."

The process of reduction, the beginnings of which we have illustrated already, was continued in the First PB, together with the addition of new ornaments appropriate to the reconstructed rites.

104. Rule for Ornaments.

Both the Act of Eliz., and the PB of 1662, of which that Act formed the first item, referred back (with certain qualifications) to the First PB as a standard of ornaments. But on examination we find that it is quite inadequate by itself; for (1) it is by no means exhaustive, some ornaments that are not named being almost necessary, and others properly subsidiary to the services and desirable on the score of decency or convenience; and (2) a large proportion of the ornaments mentioned in it have been rendered illegal by later legislation. Out of 18 ornaments of the ch., 8 or 9 are now illegal, and (on the view adopted in this art.) 5 out of 9 of the ornaments of the min. The canons of 1604, the evidence of custom, and, above all, the PB of 1662 have to be called in to supplement the initial rule. All that the study of the First PB can do is (1) negatively, to indicate what older ornaments were discarded, and may not be re-introduced unless explicitly revived by "this Ch. and Realm," and (2) positively, to start us with a list of arts. which are legal unless lawfully superseded or disused. The results of such an investigation can be most concisely and clearly exhibited in tabular form, and the accompanying table must for the most part be left to tell its own story.

In the cols. mention is shown by a ref. no. or mark, exclusion by zero (0), mere non-mention by a dash. In the 1662 col. + means admitted to be subsidiary (± if only under certain conditions). Round brackets indicate a disputed point. In the central col. italic type marks the text of the 1662 PB, the inverted commas as explained under § 15 above, and the numerals aft. titles refer to Table I at end of RITUAL LAW.

A few annotations will be necessary in order to elucidate some of the items. The relevant arts. (see App. n 3-6) may also be consulted.

105. Notes. || ar, 2] The 1549 PB, by using both Altar and Table, left the nature of the structure undetermined, and therefore at the discretion of the bps., or of the King as Supreme Ordinary. But as early as Mar. 19 action was taken for removing stone altars, and though Ridley's Injns., as Scudamore remarks, were less peremptory on this point than on others where he felt he had the PB and its enforcing Act clearly behind him, the Order of the Council for removal of altars, when it came out at the end of the year, was able to refer to a widespread process of removal which was thenceforward to be universal. The 1559 order, appended to the Injns., accompanying a PB from which the ambiguous word altar had been omitted, assumed that the old altars were illegal, and merely provided for the manner of removal. It should be added that the old stone altar was not regarded as an 'ornament of the ch.' (the ch. being rather an ornament of the altar), but that the Lord's Table may perhaps be so styled in the stricter sense.

|| a3] As the granting of a faculty for a reredos is at the discretion of the Court, the subject should be approved before a definite order is given.

|| b 1-13] For the destruction of the old service-books cp. § 103 above, and HISTORY or PB, § 7. A R. Order went out on Christmas Day in 1549 to Cranmer, bidding him call in "all antiphoners, missals, grayles, processionales, manuelles, legends, ples, portasies, jorinales, and ordinales after the use of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private use, and all other booke of service, the keeping wherof shold be a let to the usage of the said boke of common prs., and that you . . . them so deface and abolyshe that they never after may serve eyther to anie soche use, as they were provided for, or be at any time a lett to that godly and uniform ordre, which by a common consente is now set forth." And the act against images (3 and 4 Edw. 6, c. 10) included the old service-books.

|| cr1] The fair linen cloth was till 1552 left to the good sense of the incumbent to be supplied as necessary for decency. It had not been 'omitted' from the rubrics of the Sarum Missal, and it was never, of course, forbidden in any bp.'s injns. But the growth of irreverence made it desirable to order it in 1552.

|| c2] The under corporas is in common use, but the present rubrics not only omit reference to it, but exclude it where it was optional in 1549 (H17, n. 4), just as they exclude the chrisom. Cp. the similar case of the chrisom, d19. It survives as a precautionary adjunct.

|| c 3-7] The second fair linen cloth, forming the over corporal or pall, is the only linen ornament ordered in addition to the first, and, with a single chalice, is sufficient, first folded, and after the administration unfolded. The term "chalice veil" would be appropriate, but has been applied to a different ornament, for the provision or use of which there is no old precedent (cp. PH, p. 173).

|| cr1] Banners are effectively used in processions outside the ch., but within it are in strictness confined to decorative use. || d5, 7-9] See, for these ornaments, ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 3, under date 1549, and n.

|| d12-14] The problems connected with the law and practice of episcopal dress must be passed over here; cp. OCM, pp. 91-107, and ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 8, 4.

|| d20, 21] The Confirmation veil rests, as did the Churching veil, on custom, which in the latter case was enforced by law.

|| et, 2] The old priest's chalice was very small, he being the only receiver of the wine. The Pre-Reformation chalice was condemned as unlawful under Eliz., Bp. Guest, e.g., in 1565 ordering "a decent cup of silver" in its stead. Frere (VAL 3 155 n.) conjectures that there was some general order. But a careful reading of the 1549 and 1552 (= 1559) rubrics together suggests that the PB rule was understood as such.

|| e4] The water cruet is permissible in the ch. as subsidiary to the ASLUTIONS (which have been themselves pronounced to be lawful), but not for the making of the chalice (the mixing not being permitted during the service). The case of a second consecration produces a dilemma: either unmixed wine must then be used, or the mixing must take place in the service.

|| e6] The SPOON is for the removal of any foreign element from the wine, or for use in administering to an invalid.

|| f1] CP. RITUAL LAW, § 16, for R. Order 8° of 1561, and ab. § 22, for Advt. 16 (see further under f15 below).

|| f3] CP. ab., § 16, 1°-5°.

|| f8] CP. § 100 above.

|| f10] R. Injn. 30 in 1547 ordered an alms chest, which the wardens were to "set and fasten near unto the high altar," and this seems to be "the poor men's box" assumed as known by the First PB. But the ALMS chest of canon 84 the wardens were to "set and fasten in the most convenient place," the ceremonial use of it being altered in 1552, and abolished in 1662.

|| f11] CP. "bef. the chancel door," in the Interp. of 1561, q. above in § 95.

|| f15] On Nov. 15, 1573, Parker wrote to Cecil in an often quoted letter (Corr., p. 450): "The world is much given to innovation; never content to stay to live well. In London our founts must go down, and the brass eagles, which were ornaments in the chancel and made for lectures, must be molten to make pots and basins for new founts. I do but marvel what some men mean, to gratify these puritans . . . with such alteration, where order hath been taken publicly this seven years by commissioners according to the statute, that founts should not be removed."

|| f16] CP. 71 n. ||. The earliest instance quoted in Hier. Ang. (2 35) is at Cant. Cath. in 1584, "Item, a low deske in the myddest of the Chöre."

|| f18] CP. R. Orders 5° and 6° of 1561 in § 16 of RITUAL LAW, and Advt. 14°, ab., § 22.

|| g1] For the use of the pax, cp. § 71 above.

|| g5] The ceremonial use of incense seems to have been at once recognised as inconsistent with the First PB, which omitted all the directions for the censuring of persons and things which were contained in the Sarum Missal, as well as the accompanying words. After his apology for vestments in 1550 (§ 99 n.), P. Martyr went on, "Do not say to me, there will now be a window opened to all abuses, to holy water, to incense, and endless other matters of that sort. For your opponents [Cranmer and the moderates] will answer, that a limit must be appointed in the things they recall and retain, in order that the assembly of the faithful be not burdened with this kind of matters, and that neither the worship nor power of religion be placed in them, as we see to be done in holy water and incense" (Gorham, Ref., Gleanings, p. 191). No instance has been established of its ceremonial use in any cath. or parish ch. from 1559 and onwards for 300 yrs.; cp. OCM, p. 62, and see art. INCENSE for fumigatory use.

|| g8] R. Injn. 24 in 1547 ordered that "all ringing or knolling of bells shall be utterly forborne at that time [i.e., during service], except one bell in convenient time to be rung or knolled bef. the sermon."

|| g9] For these hand bells, cp. arts. 6, 9, and 13 of 1549, under RITUAL LAW, § 6, where the use of such bells at funerals or sick communions, or the maintaining of holy bells, is forbidden. Under Eliz. the Puritans complained of the "ringing of hand bells in many places," perhaps at funerals, among "Popish abuses" (A Part of a Register, q. Hier. Ang., 1 259).

|| g16-g18] It is clear that the superstitious use of lights in various ways was one of the abuses that was earliest and most effectively dealt with in the 16th cent. (cp. § 100 above), and also that, when the First PB came into force, only two were allowed by authority, i.e., those "on the high altar bef. the sacrament." But the effect of the First PB is not undisputed, as lights were not a matter of rubrical direction in the Missal. The arts. of 1549 and Ridley's Injns. of 1550 (RITUAL LAW, § 6) are clear, however, in ordering the cancelling of the permissive "mention" of candles in the 1547 R. Injns., and this—it is suggested—would hardly have been feasible in London, if the 1549 Act of Unif. had not been understood to exclude lights, the whole ritual and ceremonial order of “the popish mass” being replaced by the PB. Moreover, the omission in the 1559 Injns., which otherwise followed closely those of 1547, of all points noted by the arts. of 1549 as cancelled in the 1547 Injns. is strongly in favour of the validity of this cancellation. It is also the fact that such was the thoroughness of the suppression of lights that Q. Eliz.’s use of lighted candles, on the Lord’s Table at evensong before the crucifix, was violently protested against, and when, after a few years, the candlesticks in the Q.’s chapel were violently thrown down, they were never restored. The utilitarian use gradually came in again in certain chs. early in the 17th cent., but there is no single clear case of the use of lighted candles, otherwise than for the purpose of giving light, under any PB before the 19th cent. The Lambeth Judgment in favour of lights at HC was partly based on a numbered list of historical data, none of them conclusive; it set aside the suppression of lights in 1549 and 1550 as unauthorised, without considering whether it was authorised by the Act of Unif.; it drew a distinction, between the lighting of candles and the use of them when lighted, which is held to be without due foundation; and on this question of lights it has never been reviewed by any Court composed of trained judges, for this point was ruled out as irrelevant by the Judicial Committee. And, innocent as are many of the varied meanings which have been attached to the use of lights, it is merely the fact that such altar lights were a late mediæval innovation, and were first authorised in England in a statute (not a canon) promulgated at the Synod of Oxford in 1222 by Card. Langton on his return from the 4th Lateran Council, at which the dogma of Transubstantiation was first formulated, and which was presided over by Innocent III, who was the first person to speak of lights set on the altar itself (Schmid, Liturgik der Christkatholischen Kirche 2 39, q. Tomlinson).¹ In 1547 nothing had been done to repudiate that dogma; while in 1549, the adoration and elevation of the Host being abolished by the First PB (as both sides admitted, cp. Gasquet, Edw. 6 and First PB, p. 395), a decisive change had been made. It is urged that the immediate disuse of incense and lights, and the further disuse in 1552 of distinctive vestments and wafer bread, were natural alterations in ceremonial, whether we think them desirable or not, and legally effected. It is, however, widely held that the Lincoln Judgment sufficiently authorises altar lights, and they are used in good faith in many chs., without any special doctrinal meaning, as a suggestive and seemingly emblem of truths which all Christians associate with the Eucharist.

¶ [§ 20, § 21] The PB omitted both directions for the washing of hands and the accompanying words. Bp. Andrewes seems to have adopted the practice in his chapel, but without sufficient authority (cp. OCM, p. 63, and, for absence of direction, see [§ 11-13 above]).

LAW, where all the most relevant data are collected and discussed) that nothing is needed here but the briefest summary. The strength of what has been called (OR, § 1) the primâ facie view may be quickly stated. (1) It looks so obvious, that the opposite view has been thought disposed of by saying that it involves the insertion of ‘not’ into the rubric. (2) Gibson, Burn, Stephens, and both Phillimore, gave it the weight of their authority as eccles. jurists. (3) It found what was taken as an authoritative summary in the dictum of the Privy Council in the Westerton Judgment in 1857 that “the same dresses and the same utensils and arts. which were used under the First PB of Edw. 6 may still be used.” (4) It has been for 50 years upheld by devout and active men, some of whom have gone to prison on its behalf. (5) The Report of the Five Bps. in 1908 has been regarded by perhaps the majority of Churchmen as settling the matter.¹

Yet a number of students, intimately acquainted with all phases of the question, and not all of them opposed to the policy of a distinct Eucharistic vesture, hold to the opposite view. Those who wish to test candidly the strength of this alternative should examine the following crucial points.

(1) The primâ facie view ceases to be so obvious, (a) when it is seen to involve reading ‘retained’ as ‘re-introduced,’ (b) when it is noted that it leaves the Min. without direction as to his dress for Lit., Matr., or Comm., (c) when it is known that the first extant expression of this interpretation was nearly half a century after the framing of the Rubric, and (d) when it is realised that the Revisers did not comply with this reading of it themselves, and with one consent imposed the contrary view upon the clergy. (2) Two bodies of English Judges, on the only occasions when this question has been taken to the Final Court, have rejected the primâ facie view.² (3) The adoption by “this Ch. and Realm” of the Elizabethan Act of Unif. as the first item in the PB is a proof of continuity of policy. (4) This Act must carry with it all orders to which its provisos gave statutory force. (5) From the summer of 1559 to 1858 (all but 300 years) there is no clear case of the use of chasuble or tunicles anywhere, though a large proportion both of clergy and laity were in favour of the old régime, and though such vestments were concealed up and down the country with a view to future use. (6) At the Visitations, in Aug., 1559, and later years down to Laud’s Vis., these vestments were uniformly burnt, defaced, or converted to other use, wherever produced. As Abp. Davidson put it (R. Com. Eccles. Disc. 2 178, Q. 9621), “The facts as we have got them historically would correspond very closely with what you would have expected them to be, had the whole thing been indisputably illegal from the first.” (7) The presumption is that those responsible for the administrative action, who included the principal framers of the Act, complied with its requirements; and no less than five occasions of “taking order” have been indicated, all independent, and so needing to be separately disproved in order to rebut the circumstantial evidence of compulsory disuse. Passing over the first two, which are merely possible cases (the re-enactment of the 1552 rubric, the proviso being read of non-ritual use, and the issue of the R. Injns.), there are three distinct modes of fulfilment, each of which is regarded by many as sufficient: (a) the imposition of the Injns. for subscription upon all the clergy by R. Visitors who were also Commissioners for causes eccles. under the great seal, (b) the administrative 'taking order' in the ensuing Vis., and (c) the Advts. of 1566, which on good grounds are held to have supplied any possible lack of legality remaining.

(8) The final conclusion then turns on two pivots, (a) that the vestments were illegal in 1660 and not then re-adopted in practice, and (b) that both the analysis of the OR, and the circumstantial evidence as to the intentions both of Revisers and Parl. in 1661-2, exclude the view that any change in the law was then made.—R3-6.

VIII. TIMES AND SEASONS.

Our study of R. is still incomplete. Rites and Ceremonies and Ornaments are all needed.

Mere words may express the inward religion of the heart in solitude.¹

107. R. and
Time-order.

But souls in fellowship must have common words appointed by some common R. Order. That Order, moreover, for embodied souls like ours, must regulate, after some seemly fashion, the sounds, gestures, and movements, the postures and positions, which clothe the Rite with an elastic setting of Ceremonial, to fit the diversities of persons, times and places. So, further, an Order must be devised for utilising, without eccentricity or extravagance, man's constructive imagination in preparing the Ornaments necessary or desirable for such a ceremonial system: a strong and noble fabric, books and vessels, furniture and fittings, comely vestures, "fair linen," and "carpet of silk." Lastly, the hallowing of Time must follow the consecration of Space.

Both time and space are forms within which man moves by God's appointment (see RELIGION, §§ 5-9), but space is more akin to matter, and time to spirit. So the consideration of the element of time is a kind of completion of the circle of life. The fire of true RELIGION must first be kindled upon the altar of the heart, in the recesses of the enfranchised spirit. But sound and movement and visible form are demanded, if the heart is to beat in unison with other kindled hearts. And this outward movement carries the risk of formalising and externalising religion. The remedy is to be found in the right use of time. And that use is not to attempt the Sisyphean task of marking all moments with a consecration of the same kind. To pray without ceasing is not to spend the whole of every day in conscious devotion. That way lies madness, and the abnormal experiences of many old-world hermits and monks, and of mediæval and modern 'mystics,' have been due to this fruitless endeavour to be something other than human. Healthy life is built up of rhythmic pulsations, and religion—the life of God in the soul of man—must obey this law.

So the Ch. of Eng. in the PB has expressed firmly and clearly this principle. Prayer, in the wide sense which includes praise and all other forms of that colloquy between the soul and God which is the vital breath of religion, is to be not only Daily, but Morning and Evening Prayer. The charge of daily recitation of the prescribed forms is only laid upon Priests and Deacons, and of public recitation upon Curates, the people being invited to join in according to their leisure and ability. But the principle is universal, that as God's love is new every morning, so man's response should meet it with new devotion, and that as God's care is needed each new evening, so man's trustful surrender to that care should be made afresh each night. And the most serious want in the PB system is the failure to provide at least two simple forms of private pr., to be used with unfailing regularity, one before and the other after Confirmation.¹ To these should be added similar plain and pithy forms of Family Prayer. Each should represent a minimum of effort and capacity, but should admit of indefinite expansion. The PB system implies that the soul needs twice a day an undistracted interval of solitary communion with God; and also that as many as is possible should have opportunity (at night or morning or both) not only of common fellowship with God, but also of fellowship with one another on that serene and inspiring level to which prayer lifts the praying soul. A short lesson (carefully chosen), a few added sentences of explanation or application, and a hymn (sung, if possible) are adjuncts which lend brightness and variety.

108. Daily

The older and fuller provision of HOURS OF PRAYER no longer has authority in the Eng. Ch., but is found edifying in revised forms by religious communities and private individuals. Short noontide prs. are more largely used.

The working WEEK is broken by Wed. and Fri. as days of special observance, but the most powerful rhythmic pulsation of the common religious life is connected with the observance of the Lord's Day. The substitution of Sunday for Sat. as the day of rest and worship has established two things. (1) The observance of any particular day is not of the unchangeable essence of religion.

109. Sunday

¹ The strength of Islam in part comes from the mere psychological power of the prescribed minimum of daily observance of religion. Bp. Butler, in his charge of 1751, adduced the same example, "The Mahometans are obliged to short devotions five times between morning and evening"; and, after instancing the similar training among Roman Catholics, he adds, "By these means their superstition sinks deep into the minds of the people, and their religion also into the minds of such among them as are serious and well disposed." If a man has no such habit, he is like a vessel without a handle: there is nothing to get hold of him by, or keep him up with (cp. Christ and Human Needs, 1912, p. 100, The Problem of Islam).

(2) The seal of the universal Ch. has been unmistakably set on Sunday. The Ch. gradually awoke to the consciousness of an overmastering impulse of devotion which bid her sanctify the day of her Lord's victory over sin and death as her weekly festival of worship and spiritual refreshment, and she has never changed her mind. Why and how the Ch. should to-day rouse herself to safeguard this Jewel of time, of which the World would fain rob her, see under SUNDAY.

Here it is enough to say that the Scriptural ideal developed in the PB is that the Lord's Ministers¹ in every part of the Lord's vineyard² shall invite the Lord's People³ to assemble at the Lord's House⁴ on the Lord's Day⁵ to hold fellowship with the Father,⁶ in that Divine Service⁷ which is modelled on and built up round the Lord's Prayer,⁸ to hear the Lord's Word,⁹ and to proclaim the Lord's Death¹⁰ at the Lord's Table¹¹ as guests at the Lord's Supper,¹² offering all their worship in the Lord's Name¹³ and with the Lord's Reverence.¹⁴

The recitation of the Psalter marks the months, and the element of ordered variety is secured by the ancient annual cycle of the Christian Year.

"Yes, if the intensities of hope and fear Attract us still, and passionate exercise
Of lofty thoughts, the way before us lies Distinct with signs, through which in set career,
As through a zodiac, moves the ritual year
Of England's Church; stupendous mysteries!
Which whoso travels in her bosom eyes—
As he approaches them—with solemn cheer."¹

And along this yearly circuit gleam and burn the Feast of Christ and His elder Saints. The list of holy-days has been, like the lists of ceremonies and ornaments, greatly reduced. And zeal for ancient observances² has not always been careful to note that the BLACK-LETTER DAYS have no longer any eccles. authority as days of religious obligation.³ But the Sundays and greater Festivals are left to shine out with a more eminent lustre. It is perhaps worth considering whether a better observance might not be obtained by an authorised agreement to hold the principal Evensong of the ordinary holy-days upon (say) the Wednesday or Thursday in their octave, so that the faithful could keep that evening free from fixed weekly engagements, one or other day being settled in each parish, town, or district, to suit local convenience.

² Cp. another of the Eccles. Sonnets: "Would that our scrupulous sires had dared to leave Less scanty measure of those graceful rites And usages, whose due return invites A stir of mind."

³ Dr. Frere, in his Lit. Ref., has shown no lack of courage in his detailed suggestions for the future.

The reform of the excessive number of holy-days was one of the first matters taken in hand after the breach with Rome. An ordinance of the King in and with Conv. was issued 111. Reduction of Holy-days. on July 19th, 1536 (Wilkins, conc. 3 823). It may be summarised thus. (1) The Dedication festival was to be kept on the 1st Sun. in Oct. (2) The 'ch. holy-day,' or feast of the patron, was no longer to be kept unless otherwise ordered. (3) There were to be no obligatory feasts between July 1 [June 24] and Sept. 29, or in Westminster term time, i.e., Easter—from the 18th day aft. Easter to Mon. aft. Asc.; Trinity—from Wed. aft. the octave of Trin. to July 11 or 12; Mich.—from Oct. 9 or 10 to Nov. 28 or 29; Hilary—from Jan. 23 or 24 to Feb. 12 or 13. Exceptions were feasts of Apostles, of Our Lady, of St. George, and such as judges observe by not sitting at Westminster (i.e., Asc., St. John Bapt., All Saints, and Purif.; but service might be said still on the abrogated days, though not 'solemnly,' and without bell or pressing people to come. (4) The four general offering days were to be Christmas, Easter, Midsummer, and Michaelmas.—The clergy were not to speak of abrogated feasts, but to "pass over the same with such secret silence, as they may have like abrogation by disuse, as they have already by our authority in Convocation."

A little later it was added (ib., 3 827) that Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and Corpus Christi, and the feasts following, were to be kept as before. The 1536 R. Injns. enforced these orders, and those of 1538 added that the eves of abrogate days were not to be kept as fasts, and that Thomas Becket's feast was to be abrogated.

See further, CHRISTIAN YEAR (for refs. to Rationale of services), FESTIVAL, BLACK-LETTER DAYS.

When the old canonical prescriptions were superseded by a single statutory enactment enforcing the First PB, no clause

112. Law of Times. was inserted requiring service to be held under penalty on any particular days, the bps. being apparently left to use their own authority in this regard. It was the same in 1552. Even in 1559 the Min.'s duty was only indirectly implied by the obligation of the parishioners "to resort unto their Parish Ch. . . upon every Sunday, and other days ordained or used to be kept as Holy-days"

(so that he must be there to minister), unless the general clause enacting that the Min. shall be "bounden to say and use Mattins, etc., in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book" is to be taken as carrying an obligation extending beyond the Rites, Ceremonies, and Ornaments, to the Times and Seasons for which provision is made. Even in that case the condition of being "reasonably hindered" would certainly exempt any one not otherwise wantonly negligent from the legal obligation of daily service (cp. B2⁹). The corresponding clause in the 1662 Act is apparently, but perhaps not certainly, more precise, appointing that the PB services "shall upon every Lord's day, and upon all other days and occasions, and at the times appointed, be . . . read by . . . every Min." For a helpful discussion of the general question, see the evidence of Abp. Davidson bef. the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. (3 397). A full catena of quotations from older Anglican Divines, and the list of week-day services in London from Pietas Londonensis, 1714, is given in Stephens' BCP with Notes 1 304-324.

The Lit. on Wed. and Fri. is more clearly compulsory from the presence of the parallel clause, "and at other times, when it shall be commanded by the Ordinary," as though the Wed. and Fri. recitation were already commanded. It is also enforced both by the Advts. of 1566 and the Canons of 1604. The times at which HC is to be administered in parish chs. is left to the discretion of the curate, who must, however, obviously afford opportunity for "every Parishioner" to "communicate three times in the year, of which Easter shall be one" (cp. canon 21), and ought to celebrate the Sac. frequently enough to be able without mockery to exhort his congregation to the "often receiving of the HC." Similarly in cath. and collegiate chs. the appointed rule of weekly reception carries with it the duty of weekly celebration. As, however, no order which could carry a statutory penalty was attached to this duty, for the obvious reason that a celebration requires a sufficiency of communicants (3 out of only 20), it became necessary to lay down as a matter of eccles. discipline in canon 23 that in Colleges and Halls at the Universities, where men could be "ordered" by authority, the HC should be administered "on the 1st or 2nd Sun. of every month,"¹ and the members and servants of these societies were to be "so ordered that every one of them shall communicate 4 times in the year at least" (i.e., canon 23). Canon 24 is sometimes read as only requiring the wearing of copes "upon principal feast-days."

The hours of service in parish chs. and chapels have been in the main left at the discretion of the curate, subject (presumably) to the direction of the Ordinary; but in 1547 the R. Injns. for Westminster diocese ordered that Divine Service on Sunday "be done and ended in every parish ch. . . . bef. 9 a.m. . . . , that the priests and the laity of this city may resort to the sermon to be made in your cath. ch., except they have a sermon made and preached in their own parish chs. . . ."; and Cranmer asked in 1548 "whether the service in the ch. be done at due and convenient hours." But the root of the matter may be found in the Injn. of Bp. Hooper in 1551:

"That the curate or minister, with the advice and consent of the whole parish, shall agree upon one certain hour for saying of the Morning prs. upon the Sundays and other holy-days, as also the Evening prs. . . . and so the most convenient hour agreed upon to be observed and kept, that all the parish may come thereunto except they have just occasion and causes to the contrary, so that from hence forth none of the parishioners break violate and neglect the common pr. . . . as hitherto they have done" (Frere, VAI ii. 44 18. In the same valuable collection may be found many interesting details as to the regulation of hours of service in cath. chs.).

Wanton or ill-considered change in regard to hours of service is as undesirable as in the case of any other customary observance. But the practical nature of Ch. ORDER must again be insisted upon here. There is no sacredness about 8 a.m., 11 a.m., or 6.30 (or 7) p.m. That hour should be chosen which is found for good reasons most convenient by most worshippers. On great festivals, at least, a celebration earlier than 8 a.m. is needed in many parishes. Not a few find 9 a.m. a convenient hour for a sung Eucharist. But a later celebration is necessary (say) once a month for elderly and infirm people. In other parishes a shortened service with an address is valued at 9.30 a.m. A late evening service is adopted at other chs. with advantage, sometimes for special classes, sometimes for whoever may find it convenient, and sometimes as a mission service for non-churchgoers. It is a question whether sometimes, in place of building new chs. close together in populous districts, it would not be better to employ an augmented staff and multiply the services at an existing church.—c.

Before bringing to a close an art., which from its character and contents has required extended treatment, it may be well to recall 114. Conclusion. once more the precise function of the R. of the PB. It is the expression of religion, while religion is more than expression, and is normally prior to such expression as the PB appoints. For that conception of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION which is embodied in the PB embraces much more than worship. Indeed, RELIGION, whether consciously apprehended or unconsciously included in the good life, has its seat in the heart, and loses its very soul and essence, its force and its fragrance, if it be not the inspiring principle of conduct. It is the province of Ch. ORDER, in the several realms and areas of home, school, college, club, guild, parish, rural deanery, diocese, province, Ch., to guide and control the religious life of the members of the Ch., so that the various elements of religion may enrich in due proportions both the individuals and the society. Such Order should contain as much as possible of the elasticity, and power of ready self-adaptation, which are characteristic of a Body, and as little as possible of the rigidity and constraint of a machine.

Worship cannot properly be severed from edification. It is not something, the mere performance of which pleases God. There is no room in the Christian religion for any opus operatum, either in the form of an instrument for extracting benefits from an unloved God, or in the more attractive shape of a tribute paid to One who is loved. That is not to say that the edification must be measured by a single act of worship or a series of them. It may be a duty to the Ch. to attend habitually a service which in certain respects is found to be personally uncongenial and unedifying; but the justifying assumptions must be that united worship is a primary duty of the Christian Society, and that for Eng. Churchmen the PB services, however rendered, are the appointed means of fulfilling that obligation. The duty of laying down the main lines of R. rests with those in authority. Meanwhile, a wide latitude is left to those who have influence within the smaller areas and circles, for thoughtful and wise ordering both of the customary R. and of the other allied channels of Christian activity with which worship is to be co-ordinated. And, if one man fears to elaborate R. lest religion as a whole should suffer by the over-development of a part or a handmaid of it, while another finds in such elaboration his best means of getting a firm hold for religion among the activities and interests of life, the difference is not really one of principle, but of degree, and experience must decide. The PB is an elaboration of R., however it be taken. But let no man make of R. a bed of Procrustes, the dimensions fixed by private judgment or party dictation. Administration is one of the gifts of the Spirit, and the Spirit is the Spirit of the whole Body and of the Head, who inspires not arbitrary power, but thoughtful love.

I. That a radical change was wrought at the Reformation in regard to the source and body of law which regulated all branches of R. has been noted elsewhere (RITUAL, § 12). In the Middle Ages certain matters were indeed prescribed by CANON LAW. The essentials and many details in the administration of sacraments and other rites were laid down for all the Churches of the West. But a large margin of discretion was left for regulation by provincial or diocesan synodical canons or constitutions, or by the bp.'s Jus Liturgicum; and the varying diocesan Uses were the outcome of this discretionary liberty. Partly, these canonical and diocesan rules were expressed in the rubrical directions contained in the liturgical Books (see also RUBRICS). Partly, they were collected in codes of directions (see FIG). Partly, they remained in the form of the original enactments of the authority on which they depended.

Again, those ritual directions which rested on episcopal authority or expressed a merely diocesan use were by no means rigidly prescriptive. They often represented just the custom which had grown up in a particular Ch., e.g., the Cath. Ch. of Sarum, and, in other churches, particularly in regard to ceremonial, were taken as authoritative suggestion, to be followed so far as circumstances would admit.

"When, for example, the ceremonial directions for Mass were taken from the Sarum Ordinal, and incorporated almost bodily in the Sarum Missal (as was done in the latest days), the rubric was an excellent reminder of the way in which the stately High Mass of Salisbury Cath. was performed, but it left the priest of a country village to make the best adaptation from it that he could for his own simpler service. Elsewhere the rubric of the Service Books was devised to be the reminder of the village priest as to his best way of performing the service. In that case the more elaborate churches that used the same book were not restricted to the points which had been put in, as rubric, for the guidance of the village priest, but they had their own elaborate service, conducted according to their own customs, and subject to the legal enactments which bound them. Ceremonial rubric, therefore, might be either of the maximum sort or of the minimum sort; in the former case it did not bind every user of the book to the maximum, nor in the latter case did it restrict him to the minimum" (Frere, Liturgical Reform, p. 107).

II. The first Uniformity Act of 1549 "was an entirely new departure, and it placed rubric in an entirely new situation. Rubric became annexed to, and in a sense part of, statute law" (Frere, Lit. Ref., p. 109). In 1552 and 1662 the PB was in form a schedule to an Act of Parliament. Now it is the peculiarity of Statute Law that it can never lose its operative force until it is repealed. However obsolete its provisions may have become, yet, if circumstances allow, it may be invoked in all its pristine power. Moreover, it overrides all other sorts of law, so that if a statute clearly forbids or commands any practice, it is needless to appeal to any other authority. Further, the precise aim of the Acts of UNIFORMITY (see that art. for digest of contents) was to unify R. and repress all variations beyond the narrow limits allowed by the Acts (see RITUAL, §§ 10-12). The Acts themselves contain in the body of them no ritual directions, but operate by means of the PB annexed to or authorised by them.¹

The binding words in 1549 were that each minister must conduct every service and administer each sacrament "in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book, and none other"—i.e., using no different words—"or otherwise"—i.e., using no other ceremonies.² The second Act in 1552 annexed a new PB under the terms of the old Act. The third Act in 1559 revived the previous Acts, only making four specified alterations in the 1552 book. The last Act in 1662 confirmed again the previous Acts, but annexed a revised PB, to which their provisions were to apply. And the explicit concurrence of the Ch. by her Convs. in 1661, when the 1559 Act was made the first section of the PB, and the whole revised book was con amore remitted to Parliament for enactment as "the Order of this Ch. and Realm," may be said to give to these Acts an eccles. status which they would not otherwise have had.

As a matter of fact, however, considerable difficulties have arisen in the application of these provisions, and with the lapse of years these difficulties have increased. They have been aggravated by a common confusion of thought between the legal force of these Acts, and the enforcement of them. Custom cannot technically abrogate a statutory requirement, but a custom may become so widely adopted that it would be either impracticable or highly inexpedient to invoke the law against it. And, if some contentious individual takes such a matter into the courts, the temptation is not inconsiderable to strain a point in order to avoid condemning the custom. The use of metrical hymns at various points in the service, and the practice of turning to the East at the Creed, may be named as instances of customs which it is very hard to square with the stringent requirements of the Acts. It is one thing to hold that it is good policy not to enforce the law in particular cases, and another thing to say that it is good law that the customs in question are permitted. But the immense pressure of practical considerations condoning technical breaches of the law has without doubt confused the issues seriously. Some of the crucial cases will come up for discussion later on. Meanwhile, it may be useful to emphasise this aspect of the Acts of Unif. by quoting the dictum of the great lawyers who gave judgment in the famous cases of 1857 and 1868 (L.W., reaffirmed in M.M., Table II), "In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the PB, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be permitted."

Deliberate omission to direct is prohibition to use. Such is the interpretation placed upon the Acts by the Courts.³ Two

4. Omission as Prohibition. alternatives arise, according as the omission is the mere absence of direction, or the omission of some direction previously given. In the latter instance it is generally admitted that at least some omissions (as of the use of chrism at Bapt.) imply prohibition. And the utmost that can be said is that the mere fact of omission does not necessarily imply prohibition, but that each case must be considered on its merits.⁴ In the former alternative each case will turn on the question whether the act or thing be implicitly required by or subsidiary to the rubrics.

Against this it is usual to urge the incompleteness of the rubrics, especially in the First PB. But, even there, it is pointed out by the Five Bishops (OCM, pp. 59, 60) that, whereas "a claim has been sometimes made that . . . omission is not necessarily prohibition, and that traditional usage is taken for granted in the PB of 1549," "it is true that in some minor matters, as, e.g., the termination of the collects, some knowledge of traditional usage is presupposed, and that there are cases where the directions are obviously incomplete; but broadly it appears to be true that the publication of the PB in English involved, so to speak, a fresh start, and that the directions in it were intended to be so far complete as to guide the priest to the words he was to say and the definite ritual acts which he was to perform, and not to permit ceremonies . . . to be employed unless expressly directed."⁵ Illustrations will follow below confirming this view from various data evidencing that expositio contemporanea which carries so much weight in construing doubtful expressions in legal enactments.

² Cp. Dr. Sandav before R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 3 to, 26, 32.

III. But, besides Acts of Parliament, considerable use was made in Tudor times of a well-known mediæval instrument of government

5. Injunctions and Visitation Arts. (see INJUNCTIONS, ROYAL). Both the Sovereign,¹ by virtue of rights inherent in the regal office and expressed in the Supremacy and other Acts, and the Bps.,² issued arts. of inquiry and Injunctions.³ The precise legal force of these is variously estimated, and in any case is not the same for all. The R. Injns. of 1547 have sometimes been held to have statutory authority. But Collier (Eccles. Hist. 2:228) shows that they were not issued in the way Henry 8's Act directs Proclamations to be published to give them the force of an Act of Parliament. Moreover, "injns., homilies, and proclamations" are distinguished in an official letter of 1548 (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1:53). And the Act 31 Henry 8, c. 8, was repealed a little later in 1547. In large part the Injns. are enforcements of existing ordinances of various kinds, and are so far proof of the contemporary interpretation of the law, but in certain cases they introduce novel directions which derive force solely from the administrative authority vested in the Crown. They were not the mere ipse dixit of the Sovereign, for just as the Curia

³ One or two illustrations of the relation between the royal and episcopal jurisdictions may be of interest. On Oct. 24, 1560, Bp. Sandys wrote to the abp. (Parker, Corr., p. 126) about his recent visitation. "First, I visited with your consent; I proceeded orderly, according to laws and injns.; I innovated nothing; I was altogether led by laws." And, after referring to "my Lord of Hereford," he went on to say, "How his folks go I cannot well tell, but I assure you mine"—he was Bp. of Worcester—"go so soberly and decently as they offend no piece of the Queen's Majesty's Injns." On the other hand Cecil writes to the abp. on Aug. 12, 1561, "The bp. of Norwich (Parkhurst) is bla ed even of the best sort for his remissness in ordering his clergy. He winketh at schismatics, and anabaptists, as I am informed. Surely I see great variety in ministration. A surplice may not be borne here" (Parker, Corr., p. 149). About 1560 the abp. wrote to the Queen (Parker, Corr., p. 130), "We have of late in our consultations devised certain orders for uniform and quiet ministration in religion. We trust your gracious zeal towards Christ's religion will not im-prove (= disapprove) our doings, though such opportunity hath not offered itself as yet to be suitors to your princely authority to have a public set synod to the full determination of such causes." Parker to Cecil, 1561 (Corr., p. 138): "I have, for the execution of her laws and orders, purchased the hatred of the adversaries, and also, for moderating some things indifferent, have procured to have the foul reports of some Protestants."

was behind the Pope in the issue of his decrees, so, in the exercise of that Royal SUPREMACY into which the papal claims had been merged, the Council and the Abp. of Cant. or other body of advisers were commonly associated with the Sovereign. Such Injns. could never override statute law, and consequently were invalidated by any Act of Parliament subsequently contradicting their provisions. One instance of this is so important as to deserve extended treatment.

When in 1549 the PB was authorised by the 1st Act of Unif., the HC replacing "the popish Mass," it became necessary¹ to

6. Modifications in 1549. modify some of the Injns. of 1547, and a set of draft arts. is extant which purports to make the necessary modifications. As Canon Dixon puts it (Hist. of the Ch. of Eng. 3:38, 5:132), "That which was done in silence by the book itself [i.e., by omission] was done expressly by the Arts. of Visitation by which the book was to be enforced."² Certain of the orders are reprinted in full, both on account of their contents, and for their bearing on the interpretation of the Act of Unif. in requiring the services to be rendered "in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book, and none other or otherwise." Bp. Ridley's Injns.³ are given in parallel columns for comparison. Hooper's Injns. of 1551 may also be compared. (See Frere V. A. I. 2:190, etc., for the full text.)

Arts. to be followed⁴ and observed according to the King's Majesty's Injns. and proceedings.⁵

Injns. given in the visitation of the Rev. Father in God, Nicholas, Bp. of London, for an uniformity in the diocese.

² Cp. Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1:75. They were copied by Burnet (5:243) from a MS. in the Johnson collection which his editor, Pocock, failed to find. Frere (V. A. I. 1:136, 2:190) questions their authority, but admits that "they form a valuable commentary on the manner in which the first PB was used, which is confirmed by contemporary writers." The point here made, however, is that they rested for their authority upon the PB, and constituted its negative interpretation and enforcement in certain directions. That they had sufficient authority is shown by the enforcement of Ridley's Injns. in London itself by the Government through the intervention of the sheriff, Sir John Gates. Dr. Lushington (1855 W.L.) said: "The setting lights on the communion table was expressly forbidden by the arts. of 1549. This shows that they were regarded at the time as prohibited by 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 1, and the 1st Book, and such prohibition was a repeal of the Injns. of 1547."

³ Scudamore (Not. Euch., p. 130) remarks: "It is especially worthy of note that where he is supported by these arts. or other known authorities, he speaks in a tone of command; that where he is not, he only exhorts and recommends." The reference is to the removal of stone altars which were not clearly inconsistent with the First PB, and had not yet been forbidden by the Order in Council of Nov. 23, 1550.

1. Item, That all parsons, vicars and curates omit¹ in the reading of the Injns. all such as make mention of the popish mass, of chantries, of candles upon the altar, or any other such thing.

2. Item, For an uniformity that no minister do counterfeit the popish mass, as to kiss the Lord's Table, washing his fingers every time in the Communion; blessing his eyes with the paten or sudary,² or crossing his head with the paten, shifting of the book from one place to another; laying down and licking the chalice of the Communion; holding up his fingers, hands, or thumbs joined towards his temples; breathing upon the bread or chalice; showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution of the Communion; ringing of sacring bells; or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time; and finally to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prs., or kneeling otherwise than is in the said book.

6. Item, To receive no corpse but at the churchyard, without bell or cross.

13. Item, That going to the Sacrament to the sick, the min. have not with him either light or bells.

9. Item, That no man maintain purgatory, invocation of saints, the six arts., bederolls, relics, lights, holy bells, holy beads, holy water, patens, ashes, candles, sepulchres, paschal, creeping to the cross,

1. First, That there be no reading³ of such Injns. as extollet and setteth forth the popish mass, candles, images, chantries; neither that there be used any supralteries,⁴ or trentals of communion [i.e., sets of 30 memorial masses].

2. Item, That no minister do counterfeit the popish mass, in kissing the Lord's board, washing his hands or fingers after the Gospel, or the receipt of the HC, shifting the book from one place to another; laying down and licking the chalice after the Communion; blessing his eyes with the sudary thereof, or paten, or crossing his head with the same; holding up his forefingers and thumbs joined together towards the temples of his head, after the receiving of the Sacrament; breathing on the bread or chalice; saying the Agnus bef. the Communion; showing the sacrament openly bef. the distribution, or making any elevation thereof, ringing of the sacring bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's board. And finally that the minister in the time of HC do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed in the Book of Common Pr., and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the popish mass.

10. Item, That none maintain purgatory, invocation of saints, the six arts., bead-rolls, images, relics, rubric primers with invocation of saints, justification of man by his own works, holy bread, patens, ashes, hallowing of the font of the popish manner, oil, chrism,⁵ altars, beads, or any such abuses, contrary to the King's Majesty's proceedings.

candles, sepulchres, paschal, creeping to the cross, hallowing of the fire or altar, or any other suchlike abuses, and superstitious, *now taken away by*⁶ the King's grace's most godly proceedings.

In order to establish the fact that the same assumption, that omission is prohibition, guided Elizabethan administrators in interpreting the 1559 Act of Unif., it will be necessary to produce similar vouchers. Two may suffice.

Abp. Grindal in his York Injns. of 1571 (all after the first clause being repeated for Cant. in 1576) orders: "Ye shall not deliver the

7. Elizabethan Parallel. communion-bread into their mouths, but into their hands" (cp. RITUAL, § 37 H2, ct. H3⁸ n. 4); "nor shall use at the ministration of the Communion any gestures, rites, or ceremonies, not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing or breathing over the sacramental bread and wine, nor any showing or lifting up of the same, to the people, to be by them worshipped and adored, nor any such like" (Works, pp. 124, 120). So Abp. Whitgift in 1585 asks "whether your minister have used . . . any other rites, ceremonies, or orders, than are prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, or hath he altered them, or any of them, how, and in what manner?" (Wilkins, Conc. 438; Cardw., Doc. Ann. 24).

IV. Even Royal Orders and Injns., it has been already stated, cannot override statute law.

2. "Taking Order." But a proviso, containing two related clauses, in the Elizabethan Act (ss. 25 and 26) gave power to the Queen under specified conditions to modify or extend the terms of the Act.

Much litigation has turned on the question of the validity of orders claimed to be made under this proviso, and volumes have been written on the subject. A little clear observation will, however, simplify it considerably. Both the terms of reference and the procedure laid down are different in the two clauses. (a) S. 25 is limited to certain "ornaments of the ch. and of the ministers thereof," which are to be temporarily retained; s. 26 is concerned only with "further ceremonies and rites." (b) S. 25 provides that the ornaments specified "shall be retained and be in use . . . until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's majesty;" while s. 26 adds that "the Queen's majesty may . . . ordain and publish . . . further ceremonies and rites." (c) S. 25 requires as a condition that the order shall be taken "by the advice of her Commissioners appointed and authorised, under the great seal of England, for causes eccles., or of the metropolitan of the realm"; s. 26 includes the same condition—"by the like advice of the said commissioners or metropolitan." Under (a) we note (1) that action under s. 25 might operate so as practically to prohibit the ornaments referred to in it, but that no element of ritual could be prohibited under s. 26, which is restricted to the addition of ceremonies or rites; (2) that, in view of the close connection between ornaments and ceremonies and the elastic

⁵ Observe that these were "taken away by" omission.

use of the term "ceremony" (see the art. CEREMONY), it might be possible to bring the introduction or revival of an ornament under s. 26. Under (b) we observe (1) that, while the words "ordain and publish" in s. 26 require some written order, the terms of s. 25 would be satisfied by a mere administrative direction verbally given by the proper authority; (2) that this inference is borne out by the phrasing in s. 25 ("by the authority of the Q.'s Majesty"), contrasted with the more direct sanction mentioned in s. 26 ("the Q.'s Majesty shall ordain"); (3) that in the case of neither clause is any method specified or prescribed for the taking of order or ordaining and publishing. Under (c) it should be noted (1) that the advice required is the same in each clause; (2) that the commissioners who have authority to advise are not created under the powers of this Act but under the Supremacy Act.

The cases in which it has been claimed that action was taken under either proviso can now be considered. (i) Three (if not made:

four) cases arise in connection with the Injns. of 1559. (1) Injn. 30¹ requires that all Bps. and clergy "both in the Ch. and without," as being "the special messengers and ministers of Almighty God" . . . shall use and wear such seemly habits, garments, and such square caps as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of the reign of Edw. 6th (i.e., 1553, when the PB of 1552 was in full force). (2) The 2nd appendix to the Injns. regulated the removal of altars, and the position of the substituted tables. (3) The same appendix regulated the shape of the sacramental bread.² (4) The bidding pr. in the 3rd app. may, it is here suggested (it is believed for the first time), be regarded as a "further rite" under s. 26.

Now with regard to the statutory validity of these orders we have first a definite piece of contemporary evidence. Abp.

10. Their Validity.

Parker, writing to Cecil on Jan. 8, 1571, reports an express claim by the Queen to have put forth orders (2) and (3) under s. 26.

"Her Highness talked with me once or twice in that point, and signified that there was one proviso in the Act of the Uniformity of Common Prayer, that by law is granted unto her, that if there be any contempt or irreverence used in the ceremonies or rites of the Ch. by the misusing of the orders appointed in the book, the Queen's Majesty may, by the advice of her commissioners or metropolitan, ordain and publish such further ceremonies or rites as may be most for the reverence of Christ's holy mysteries and sacraments, and but for which law Her Highness would not have agreed to divers orders of the book. And by virtue of which law she published further order in her Injns. both for the Communion bread, and for the placing of the tables within the quire. They that like not the Injns. force much the Statute in the book [i.e., the PB, to which it was prefixed]. I tell them that they do evil to make odious comparison betwixt Statute and Injn., and yet I say and hold that the Injn. hath authority by proviso of the Statute" (Parker, Corr., p. 375).

¹ The following is the full text of the 30th Injunction:—"Of apparel of ministers.—30 Item. Her Majesty being desirous to have the Prelacy and Clergy of this Realm to be had as well in outward reverence as otherwise regarded for the worthiness of their ministries, and thinking it necessary to have them known to the people in all places and assemblies, both in the Church and without, and thereby to receive the honour and estimation due to the special messengers and ministers of Almighty God; willeth and commandeth that all Archbishops and Bishops, and all other that be called or admitted to preaching or ministry of the Sacraments, or that be admitted into vocation ecclesiastical, or into any society of learning in either of the Universities, or elsewhere shall use and wear such seemly habits, garments, and such square caps as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth, not thereby meaning to attribute any holiness or special worthiness to the said garments, but, as St. Paul writeth, 'Omni addecent et secundum ordinem fiant.' I Cor. 14 cap."

It must be admitted that this claim involves a somewhat elastic construction of the governing phrase "further ceremonies and rites," but we have seen that usage more or less supports such a construction. If, then, orders (2) and (3) had statutory force—and it is hard to imagine two better witnesses than the Queen and the abp.—under the more narrowly expressed s. 26, it follows that (1)—Injn. 30—had like validity, depending upon s. 25 which is less stringently drawn. This is, in fact, the view that has been argued elsewhere in connection with the Ornaments of the Minister. Though supported by abundant contemporary and later evidence of high authority, it has not been the view taken by the courts. The reason is that, as shown under INJUNCTIONS (ROYAL), these orders of the Queen were issued "by the advice of her most honourable council," and not of the Eccles. Commissioners¹ or metropolitan. The above view was, however, presented to the judges in association with another, quite untenable, proposition, and has hardly yet received adequate consideration.² Moreover, much evidence, some of which will be indicated below, has been accumulated in support of it since 1877, when the whole question was last tried. It is enough to say here that the claim of the Queen just noted, and the evidence of systematic official enforcement of Injn. 30, compel us to inquire whether the last objection can be regarded as final.

And this is exactly what has been elaborately attempted by Tomlinson (PBAH,

11. Order taken by R. Visitors,

pp. 34-60, cp. CAT 381, 391), who urges that "other order" was duly "taken" in the course of the

Royal Visitation of 1559. (1) It is proved that such action, expressed in such ¹ It has, however, been argued that, as from various indications it is likely that there were at that time duly qualified commissioners, they may have concurred sufficiently in the terms of the Injns. to furnish the requisite "advice." But, as without positive evidence this hypothesis must remain a pious opinion, it is without importance by the side of better founded suggestions.

² The Ridsdale Judgment (CAT 110 10) stated that "Their Lordships . . . cannot satisfy themselves, either that the Injns. pointed to the vestments now in controversy or that they were issued with the advice required by the section of the Act of Parliament."

terms, was according to precedent.¹ In 1552 a new PB had been introduced under which (RITUAL, § 24 Dⁿ n. 1) the minister was to "use neither alb, vestment, nor cope." A Royal Visitation was actually in progress; and, after the date (Nov. 1) when the new book came into force, the Visitors at once conformed their procedure to the new regulation.²

(2) The persons taking order in 1559 were such as to ensure that no guarantee of legality was wanting. Their names may be found in Gee's Elizabethan Clergy, pp. 71-132. They included such an array of statesmen, legislators, lawyers and ecclesiastics that it has been said that that Commission is probably unparalleled in the rank, authority and talent of the persons who composed it. The 18th Injn. intimates that the Visitors would be the Queen's Commissioners. Edm. Allen, chaplain to the Queen and bp. designate of Rochester, wrote on May 28, 1559, "There shall shortly be a visitation throughout the whole realm," and, after mentioning the names of certain persons, most of whom are included in the warrant dated July 19 (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1 223), adds that they "shall be Visitors and also the Queen's Commissioners for all eccles. matters." Their Commissions were duly issued "under the great seal of England for causes ecclesiastical."³ The various sets of Commissioners, moreover, among whom the country was divided, must have met and agreed upon the lines of their procedure, for Parker, the abb.-designate, writes on Aug. 27 about "the form of subscription which we devised to be used in the order of Visitations" (Parker, Corr., p. 74).

(3) By this form the Visitors required everywhere the clergy to "confess . . . the Orders and Rules contained in the Injns. given by the Queen's Majesty and exhibited in the present Visitation to be according to the true Word of God, and agreeable with the doctrine and use of the primitive and apostolic Ch.," and to subscribe their names thereto. By thus adopting the Injns. already framed "by the authority of the Queen's majesty," and imposing them upon every clergyman in the country, it is claimed that the condition as to "advice" was amply fulfilled, and that Injn. 30, if not on June 13, when we learn from a letter of Cecil that the whole set was "already framed" (S. P. Eliz. Foreign, p. 133), at any rate as soon as subscription was enforced in any particular case, became a taking of other order under s. 25.

(4) A further, and wholly independent mode of "taking other order" is claimed to be found in the proceedings immediately ensuing, by which Injn. 30 was actively enforced in the defacement, destruction, or conversion to other uses of the Eucharistic vestments.

The fact that all this took place is generally admitted. Mr. Frere said to the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. (1 165), "I know of practically no evidence at all for the use of the chasuble (between 1559 and 1566). There were a few cases, I think, where the alb may have been used, but most of them had been turned into rochets for the clerks, or surplices for the ministers"; and again (1 122), "I think it is quite clear also, that in certain cases other vestments than copes were allowed to remain in the ch., but only I think as a temporary expedient, with a view to their being destroyed as monuments of superstition. . . . Those chasubles and censers, and so on, which were left behind were merely odd cases, which, so far as I understand, were simply left behind for convenience at the moment." Similarly OCM, p. 69, "There is no evidence whatever of the wearing of the chasuble. Chasubles appear to have been generally destroyed as 'monuments of superstition' though occasional instances of their retention [cp. last quotation] may occur. . . . Copes were also destroyed or abolished in many places. At the visitation of the commissioners at St. Paul's Cath. (Aug., 1559) they 'enjoined and gave command that none in the said Cath. Ch. henceforth use . . . any shaven crowns, amises or cloathes, called Copes' (Strype, Ann. 1 170). . . . At Grantham . . . the vestments, copes, albs, tunicles and all other such baggages was defaced, and openly sold by a general consent of the whole corporation, and the money employed in setting up desks in the Ch., and making a decent Communion Table, and the remnant to the poor'" (Pearcock's Ch. Furniture, 1 p. 87).

But neither the Privy Council, nor the Royal Commission, nor the Five Bishops⁴ draw

⁴ From this source and from Tysen's Surrey Inventories abundant additional evidence can be obtained, cp. also Tcm-linson, Q. Elis. and the R. Visitations of 1549-1559 (CAT 391).

⁵ It is to be noted that in their Report (OCM., pp. 66 ff.) they do not even mention the view that "other order" was duly "taken" either by the adoption of the Injns. by the Commissioners, or by the administrative process of the Royal Visitation. Moreover, they group the Royal Injns., enforced throughout the realm during the whole reign, with the unpublished, anonymous and unauthorised draft interpretations of 1561, as "more or less formal documents making a claim

what would seem to be quite the most natural inference, that what the Queen's delegates did, in the midst of a population in

13. Alternative View. large measure hostile to their action, and with clergy to deal with who had held or received their benefices under the Marian regime, was done legally. The alternative view, that after securing the insertion of s. 25 in the Act of Unif., which looked forward to and made provision for legalising just such a "taking of order" as had within their recent memory been carried through by Visitation under the 1552 Act and Rubric, they should break the law rather than complete the law is hard to believe. Wide as the powers of the Royal Supremacy were, they did not avail to override the statute. The full complications of that alternative view¹ need to be clearly faced. It is one thing to refuse to insist on the execution of a law, and another to make its execution impossible. Four alternative vestures had been recently, at different times, allowed at HC: (1) in 1549, alb with vestment (= chasuble); (2) in 1549, as alternative to (1), alb with cope; (3) in 1553, surplice only; (4) from 1554-1558, alb, amice, girdle, stole, fanon and vestment without alternative. On the view we are considering, (1) and (2) were on June 24, 1559, made legal options (as in 1549), and (3) and (4) became as decisively illegal.

Those then who hold that the expectation aroused by s. 25 ("retained . . . until other order be taken") was not fulfilled till 1566, if at all, have to suppose, not that the authorities put up with a minimum of conformity, but that by their public administrative action they made the first of the two legal options impossible anywhere, and the second almost everywhere, while they with consistent unanimity required as the normal practice one of the two illegal forms of vesture. Yet there has survived in the literature of the time no single protest, from an incumbent or churchwarden, who professed the Marian regime, that this drastic and widespread prohibition was illegal. To many the presumption is irresistible that "other order" was duly "taken" and that the enforcement of Injn. 30 released the Orn. rubric of 1552 from the temporary restraint upon its rule of the surplice always, which was effected for a few weeks by the action of the

to some sort of authority." They reproduce without criticism objections to the Injns. The "general view" of these was largely based on quotations (e.g., by Jas. Parker and T. W. Perry) which omit such crucial words as are italicised in the quotation in § 9 above. See further J. Nunn, Orn. Rubric Explained, pp. 37 f.

¹ This may be conveniently stated in the words of the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. (Report, p. 19): "The 1st PB of Edw. 6 (1549), directed 'a white alb plain with a vestment or cope' to be worn at HC. On the establishment of Q. Eliz.'s PB in 1559, these vestments were by the Act of Unif., in clear terms, again directed to be worn; and this direction remained in force at least until the issue of the Advts. in 1566, although generally disregarded." It would be hard to substantiate from the evidence submitted to the Commissioners the statement that 'this direction [to wear alb, with vestment or cope] remained in force' during a period when the highest authorities of the Ch. and Realm permitted alb or chasuble in no single known instance, and only occasionally the cope.

proviso¹ before order was taken under it. It may be added that the validity of the orders about Communion tables and the sacramental bread (see § 9 above) must stand or fall with the validity of Injn. 30.²

It is significant that the 1559 rubric, ordering that "the Min. shall use" the 1549 ornaments, was left out in the Latin PB of 1560, though the other altered rubric about the chancels was retained. Mr. Clay, who edited the PS ed., notes that "after the issuing of Eliz.'s Injns. in July, 1559" [and, we may add, their imposition and enforcement by the R. Visitors in August] its omission "was rendered absolutely necessary (Sparrow's Collections, pp. 77, 83; Z.L., pp. 228, 272)." Its retention in the English reprints may be due to its general reference to all kinds of Ornaments and to the fact that the concluding clause showed its dependence on the governing statute.

It was necessary to treat the last group of instances at length, both for its importance, and because the view here taken had to be justified as against a greatly preponderating body of recent and current opinion (see further, §§ 18 ff. below). The next group can be more quickly disposed of. On Jan. 22, 1561, Q. Eliz. wrote to Abp. Parker a formal letter (Parker, Corr., p. 132), referring to the statutory provision enabling her "to take further order in any rite or ceremony"; noting the points on which she desired such order to be taken, i.e., (1) a revised calendar and lectionary, (2) the repair and due equipment of churches and chancels, (3) the setting up of tables of the commandments in churches, (4) the use of the Latin translation of the PB; and assuring him that this letter of hers should be his "sufficient warrant in this behalf." The letter was not issued "under the Great Seal," and of itself made no "further order" on any of the points named.

On Feb. 15, 1561, the new calendar was issued, having been "by authority and force of her royal letters missive made, conceived and established according to the form of the aforesaid statute" by the commissioners (Parker, Corr., p. 135). But "this order was neither seen, nor signed, nor sealed by the Queen herself at all" (Tomlinson, CAT 382 23). On Oct. 10 there followed Orders about chancels, regulating alteration of rood-lofts and steps, about tables of the Commandments, and various other matters, but making no reference to the Latin PB, which accordingly remained without authorisation. In the title they are styled "Orders taken . . . by virtue of Her Majesty's letters addressed to her Highness's Commissioners for causes Ecclesiastical."

² In the last of Parker's many letters to Cecil, on April 11, 1575, he protests: "Does your lordship think that I care either for cap, tippet, surplice, or wafer-bread, or any such? But for the laws so established I esteem them." It is hard to think that this scrupulous, law-respecting man was wrong about the validity of those Injns. which could be brought under the proviso, and all the more that in the same letter he criticises the claim made for other Injns. "Whatsoever the eccles. prerogative is, I fear it is not so great as your pen hath given it her in the Injn. (i.e., presumably the ratification bidding obedience to all the Injns. alike "upon pain of deprivation, sequestration of fruits and benefices, suspension, excommunication, and such other coercion, as to ordinaries, or other having eccles. jurisdiction . . . shall be seen convenient"); and yet her governance is of more prerogative than the head papists would grant unto her" (Corr., pp. 478 f.).

The subject-matter is of such interest and value that, in view of the Orders being not generally accessible, a reprint of the old copy Br. Mus. 5155, aa. 7. is reproduced below. These orders furnish a close parallel, as regards mode of authorisation, with the Advts. of 1566. It will be seen that they were only indirectly the act of the Queen, and bear no sign that she saw or approved their provisions; they do not contain any reference to the statute or proviso; and, unlike the Advts., they were not signed by the Commissioners or Metropolitan. They were, however, duly enforced by the Ordinaries.

16. Royal
Orders,
Oct., 1561.

1st Imprimis, for the avoiding of much strife and contention, that hath heretofore arisen among the Queen's subjects in divers parts of the realm, for the using or transposing of the rood-lofts, fonts, and steps, within the quires and chancels in every parish ch. It is thus decreed and ordained, that the rood-lofts, as yet being at this day aforesaid un-transposed, shall be so altered that the upper part of the same with the sollar be quite taken down unto the upper part of the vaultes, and beam running in length over the same vaultes, by putting some convenient crest upon the said beam towards the church, with leaving the situation of the seats (as well in the quire as in the ch.), as heretofore hath been used. 2nd Provided yet, that where any parish of their own costs and charges by common consent will pull down whole frame and re-edifying again the same in joiners' work (as in divers churches within the city of London doth appear), that they may do as they think agreeable, so it be to the height of the upper beam aforesaid. 3rd Provided also, that where in any parish-ch. the said rood-lofts be already transposed, so that there remain a comely partition betwixt the chancel and the ch., that no alteration be otherwise attempted in them, but be suffered in quiet. And where no partition is standing, there is to be one appointed.

4th Also that the steps which be as yet at this day remaining in any cathedral, collegiate or parish ch., be not stirred nor altered; but be suffered to continue, with Steps, Table, the tombs of any noble or worshipful personage, where it so chanceth to be, as well in chancel, church, or chapel. And if in any chancel the steps be transposed, that they be not erected again, but that the place be decently paved, where the communion table shall stand out of the times of receiving the communion, having thereon a fair linen cloth, with some covering of silk, buckram, or other such like, for the clean keeping of the said cloth on the communion-board, at the cost of the parish. 5th And further, That there be fixed upon the wall, over the said communion-board, the tables of God's precepts, imprinted for the said purpose. 6th Provided yet, That in cathedral churches the tables of the said precepts be more largely and costly painted out, to the better shew of the same. 7th Item, That all chancels be kept clean and repaired, within as without, in the windows and elsewhere as appertaineth.

8th Item, That the font be not removed from the accustomed place; and that in parish churches the curates take not upon them to confer baptism in basens, but in the Font, Bells, etc. font customably used. 9th Item, That there be no destruction or alienation of the bells, steeple, or porch belonging to any parish ch., by the private authority of any person or persons, without sufficient matter shewed to the archbishop of the province, of his and their doings, and by them allowed; except it be for cause of repairing the same. 10th Item, That neither the curates nor the parents of the children alter the common used manner for godfathers and godmothers to answer for the children, nor shall condemn the accustomed usage in the same. 11th Item, That it shall not be lawful to any ordinary to assign or enjoin the parishes to buy any books of sermons or expositions, in any other sort than is already, or shall be hereafter, appointed by public authority.

12th Item, That there be none other days observed for holy-days or fasting-days, as of duty or commandment, but only such holy-days as be expressed for holy-days in the Calendar late set forth by the Queen's authority. And none other fast ing-days (to be so commanded), but as the laws and proclamations by the Queen's Majesty provided

Calendar, Registers, etc. in the same do appoint. 13th Item, That the parson, vicar, or curate, with the churchwardens, shall yearly make and exhibit unto the registers [registrars] of the ordinary, the names and surnames of all persons married, christened, and buried, within their said parishes, by bill indented, with the subscription of their hands: noting the day and year of the said christenings, marriages, and burials, out of their original register kept in custody, as is appointed by the Queen's Majesty's Injunctions. 14th Item, That no parson, vicar, or curate, of any exempt churches, or otherwise called lawless churches, do attempt to conjoin by solemnization of matrimony any persons not being of his parish, without sufficient testimony of the banns asking in the churches where they dwell; or otherwise be authorized lawfully to marry.

On July 20, 1562, the Queen issued a fresh warrant for the Court of High Commission in matters eccles., the members including Abp. Parker, and the Bps. of London, Ely, and Rochester, with the deans of St. Paul's and Westminster, the archdeacon of Middlesex, and twenty laymen.

The warrant followed the lines of that issued in 1559 (Cardw., Doc. Ann. 1 223), referring to the Acts of Supremacy and Unif., and authorising the commissioners to deal with (4) any "misbehaviour . . . in any ch. or chapel, or against any Divine service . . . contrary to the law and statutes of this realm." They were (5) given "full power and authority . . . to visit, reform, redress, order, correct, and amend in all places within this our Realm of England all such errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, spiritual or eccles. whatsoever, which by any spiritual power, authority, or jurisdiction, can lawfully be reformed, ordered, redressed, corrected, or amended by censures eccles., deprivation, or otherwise." (The words italicised were inserted in 1562, when no set of penal Injns. accompanied the Commission, ct. § 9 n. 2¹.) Even power of imprisonment is expressly given (10). Certain clauses added in 1562 gave powers in regard to statutes for cath. and collegiate churches and other eccles. corporations (see § 31), which may have been the pattern for the procedure adopted in the Advts. (For the full text of the warrant see Tomlinson, CAT 107 5-12.)

We come now to the series of ordinances which has been most discussed. If the view taken above be correct that "other order" was duly "taken" in 1559 about the "ornaments of the ministers," the Advts. of 1566 have importance mainly as administrative orders, and only in a minor degree as legislative supplements to be read into the statute. At the same time it is believed that the available data, when properly exhibited, establish the conclusion that, supposing other order had not been previously taken, the Advts. would constitute a legal taking of order under the statute.

On Jan. 25, 1565 (old style 1564), the Queen wrote formally to Abp. Parker a long letter about eccles. disorders, and ordered him (a) to inquire into these, (b) to enforce order, and (c) to take security for loyalty from all ordinaries and presentees. The relevant clauses follow:

19. Letter of

¹ Cp. also § 11 (2) n. 3, and § 14 n. 2.

"We do by these our present letters require, enjoin, and straitly charge you, being the metropolitan according to the power and authority which you have under us over this province of Canterbury (as the like we will order for the province of York) to confer with your brethren the bps., namely, such as be in commission for causes eccles. . . . and (a) cause to be truly understand [sic] what varieties, novelties, and diversities there are in our clergy or among our people . . . either in doctrine or in ceremonies and rites of the Ch., or in the manners, usages, and behaviour of the clergy themselves. . . . And (b) thereupon . . . so to proceed by order, injunction, or censure, according to the order and appointment of such laws and ordinances as are provided by Act of Parl., and the true meaning thereof, so as uniformity of order may be kept in every ch., and without variety or contention"; And further (c) to provide that ordines shall bind themselves to conform (Corr., p. 223).

On Jan. 30 the abp. wrote for certificates from every ch. as to (a) varieties in the service. These came in by Feb. 28, and on Mar. 3 30. Parker's Procedure. Parker sent to Cecil (b) a rough draft of "Articles" ("a first view, not fully digested"). On Mar. 8 he followed this up with a revised draft as "subscribed to by the bps. conferrers," adding, "if the Queen's Majesty will not authorise them, the most part be like to lie in the dust for the execution of our parties, laws be so much against our private doings. 'The Queen's Majesty with consent, etc.,' I trust shall be obliged." This was endorsed by Cecil, "These were not authorised nor published." A year passed without any progress. Then on Mar. 12 the abp. again sent Cecil a rough draft,¹ and asked him to "seal the letter" to the Queen which he enclosed, "and deliver it." Then on Mar. 28 he (1) wrote once more to Cecil, asking him "to peruse this draft of letters [presumably the covering letters to accompany copies of the Advts.] and the book of Advts." with his pen; ² and (2), probably after receiving the drafts and book back with Cecil's approval, wrote officially to Grindal as Dean of the province, enclosing copies for him to forward to the other bishops.

¹ Parker, Corr., p. 263. Some sentences may be added from it. "Where once this last year certain of us consulted and agreed upon some particularities in apparel (where the Queen's Majesty's letters were very general), and for that by statute we be inhibited to set out any constitutions without licence obtained of the prince, I send them to your honour to be presented; they could not be allowed then, I cannot tell of what meaning; which I now send again, humbly praying that if not all yet so many as be thought good, may be returned with some authority, at the least way for particular apparel: or else we shall not be able to do so much as the Queen's Majesty expecteth for us to be done. . . . But undoubtedly I cannot but think the Queen's Majesty is unworthily dealt with, thus to be resisted . . . and if I should this attempt, and have no more warrant and help, I might, after much stirring, do little in the end, but hurt."

² The letter went on: "This form is but newly printed, and yet stayed till I may hear your advice. I am now full bent to prosecute this order, and to delay no longer, and I have weeded out of these arts. all such of doctrine, etc., which peradventure staved the book from the Queen's Majesty's approbation, and have put in but things advoidable, and, as I take them, against no law of the realm. And where[as] the Queen's Majesty will needs have me assay with mine own authority what I can do for order, I trust I shall not be stayed hereafter, saving that I would pray your honour to have your advice to do that more prudently in this common cause which must needs be done."

How are we to account for Parker, after such long hesitation and delay, issuing and forthwith enforcing the Advts.? (1) A sentence in his letter to Grindal of Mar. 28 may furnish the key:

"As the Queen's Highness," he wrote, "hath expressly charged both you and me, of late being therefore called to her presence, to see (a) her laws executed, and (b) good orders decreed and observed, . . . I can no less do but require . . . you . . . to see (a) Her Majesty's laws and injunctions duly observed within your diocese, and also (b) these our convenient Orders described in these books at this present sent unto your lordship."

From this we learn that a recent interview ("before Mar. 12," OCM, p. 72; "circa Mar. 17," Tomlinson, PBAH) had taken place at the Queen's request between them and her, besides a personal interview on Mar. 10. We know also that a letter had been sent to her through Cecil. And we infer from the occurrences of Mar. 28 that the abp. had so revised the book that he now felt confident of the Queen's approbation, and moreover that the reception of the book by her minister confirmed him in this confidence.¹

(2) On April 4 the Advts. were promulgated in London,² and enforced by the Privy Council;³ and (3) on April 28 Parker wrote to Cecil, "the Queen's Majesty willed my Lord of York to declare her pleasure determinately to have the order go forward." Finally, (4) on May 21 Grindal sent out the copies to the other bps. of the province, and to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. He bade the dean "enjoin every of them upon pain of deprivation to prepare forthwith and to wear such habit and apparel as is ordained by the Queen's majesty's authority expressed in the treaty entitled the Advts., etc., which I send herein enclosed unto you and in like to enjoin every of them under the said pain of deprivation as well to observe the order of ministration in the Ch. with surplice, and in such form as is set forth in the said treaty, as also to require the subscription of every of them to the said advts."⁴ Then (5) on May 27 the Privy Council enforced the Advts. for "crossed caps" (State Papers, Dom., Eliz., 39 82), and (6) on June 6 for the surplice (Zurich Letters, 2 120, 124).

The Advts. had to cover a wide field of disorders, and consequently were very miscellaneous in character.¹ Space can only be found for a selection of those most permanently interesting. After the title and preface four sections contained the "good orders" now duly "decreed" in which the Abp. and his colleagues "proceeded by order and injunction" in reformation of disorders, and the fifth ensured the conformity of future ordinees (see the Queen's letter, b and c, in § 19 above).

By virtue of the Queen's Majesty's letters, commanding the same, the 25th day of Jan., in the 7th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Elizabeth, etc.

The Preface.—The Queen's Majesty, calling to remembrance how necessary it is for all her loving subjects, especially the State ecclesiastical, to be knit together in one perfect unity of doctrine and to be conjoined in one uniformity of rites and manners in the ministration of God's Holy Word, in open prayer and ministration of Sacraments, as also to be of one decent behaviour in their outward apparel, to be known partly by their distinct habits to be of that vocation (who should be revered the rather in their offices as ministers of the holy things whereto they be called), hath by her letters directed to the Abp. of Canterbury and Metropolitan, required, enjoined, and straightly charged that, with assistance and conference had with other Bishops, namely such as be in commission for causes ecclesiastical, some orders might be taken whereby all diversities and varieties among them of the clergy and the people (as breeding nothing but contention, offence, and breach of common charity, and be against the laws, good usage, and Ordinances of the Realm) might be reformed and repressed and brought to one manner of uniformity throughout the whole realm, that the people may thereby quietly honour and serve Almighty God in truth, concord, unity, peace, and quietness as by Her Majesty's said letters more at large doth appear. Whereupon by diligent conference and communication in the same, and at last by assent and consent of the persons aforesaid, these orders and rules ensuing have been thought meet and convenient to be used and followed: nor yet prescribing these rules as laws equivalent with the eternal Word of God, and as of necessity to bind the consciences of her subjects in the nature of them considered in themselves; or as they should add any efficacy or more holiness to the virtue of public prayer, and to the Sacraments, but as temporal orders mere ecclesiastical, without any vain superstition, and as rules in some part of discipline concerning decency, distinction, and order for the time."

16° Item, That the Font be not removed, nor that the Curate do Baptise in Parish-Churches in Basons, nor in any other form than is already prescribed, without charging the parent to be present or absent at the Christning of his Child, although the parent may be present or absent, but not to answer as Godfather for his Child.

17° Item, That no Child be admitted to answer as Godfather or Godmother, except the Child hath received the Communion.

18° Item, That there be none other holy-days observed besides the Sundays but only such as be set out for holy-days, as in the Statute Anno quinto & sexto Edwardi sexti, and in the new Kalender authorized by the Queens Majesty.

The history of the Advts., previous to their general distribution on May 21, has been diversely interpreted, in its bearing on the question of their validity, either in general as Royal Orders under the Supremacy Act, or, so far as qualified by subject-matter, as Statutory Orders under the proviso of the Act of Unif. Historians, like Dixon, Gee, and Frere (following J. H. Parker), noting how the abp. waited so long for some additional authorisation, have inferred that the Queen's letter was not enough, that he never obtained the authority he desired, and that the Advts. were merely episcopal orders issued at the prompting of the Queen, and with her countenance, but lacking the sort of Royal sanction needed to bring them under the powers of either Act. They suggest that while, on their first appearance, they were evidently supposed to be the Queen's, suspicion was eventually aroused; that Parker never claimed full authority for them; and that it was only after his death that a fresh tradition of their Royal authority grew up.

On the other hand, Lord Selborne declared, "No writer of reputation, in any work published before the 18th cent., seems to have suggested a doubt that they were, as a matter of fact, authorised by Q. Eliz." In addition to the phrases italicised in the Queen's Letter (§ 19), and the six data given under § 21, we may now adduce in support of this view some further pieces of evidence.

(1) The title contains the definitive description "Advts. . . . by virtue of the Queen's Majesty's letters commanding the same" (cp. §§ 15, 16 above). (2) The Preface refers to the Queen as "enjoining," the abp. and eccles. commissioners as enjoined, the aim of the enjoining—"that some orders might be taken," the "assent and consent of the persons aforesaid" (not 'the undersigned,' i.e., commissioners, bps., etc., so that the Queen may reasonably be included), and the prescription of "these orders and rules" as temporal orders mere eccles."

(3) On May 25, 1566, the Spanish ambassador (Hume, Span. S.P. 1 553) wrote that "although by order of the Queen and after much

24. Early Confirmation. exhortation measures have been taken to make clergymen wear their ancient garb . . . not only have many refused to obey, but have written against it, and even against the Queen, who, and then they say, had no right to make such an order," and further that "the Queen believed or was informed that the Bp. of London would not execute the order very zealously, and she rated him soundly and threatened to punish him for an anabaptist." Later, in 1576, we find Grindal well aware of the importance of not opposing "the Queen's Injns., nor the Ordinations, nor Arts. made by some of the Queen's Commissioners . . . Jan. 25, in the 7th year of the Queen's reign."¹

(4) (a) Stow, the contemporary chronicler, says (Hist. Memoranda, p. 135) that immediately after their issue, "in some places the ministers themselves did service in their gowns or cloaks, with turning collars and hats as they were wont to do, and preached stoutly and against the order taken by the Queen and the bps. for consenting thereto." (b) Parker finding difficulty as to how to proceed in enforcing the Advts., the Privy Council intervened and punished some who wrote "against the Prince and public authority of laws," and "the Queen's command respecting the cap and surplice" (Z.L. 2 119; Parker, Corr., p. 285). (c) Some of the deprived clergy wrote in a little book about the Advts. "The power of the Prince does not extend so far as to enforce them." The book was at once prohibited, the copies confiscated, and the printer imprisoned (cp. Frere in Hist. of Eng. Ch. 4 122). And (d) on June 29 the Council put forth an order that no one "should print any book against . . . any injunction, letters patent, or ordinances passed or set forth or to be passed or set forth by the Queen's grant, commission, or authority."

(5) (a) Gualter in 1566, writing to Humphrey, spoke of "the Queen's Majesty's ordinance for the wearing of the surplice and priest's cap" (Lansdowne MS. 9 1), and (b) in writing to Beza on Sept. 11 twice described the Advts. as a "Royal Edict," quoting phrases only in them (Zurich Letters 2 143-5). (c) As early as May 1 Bullinger dealt with Humphrey's query whether under "the authority of a Royal Edict" he could rightly obey the Advts. (Z.L. 1 348-9), while (d) Humphrey wrote to the Queen, also in 1566, "Rogamus iterum iterum atque iterum, Elizabetha princeps, ut Edictum tuum Vestiarium ac ceremoniale vel abroges pie, vel proroges benigne" (Strype, Ann. i. 2 516, where the reference can hardly at that juncture be to any "Edict" but the latest, and the one under which action was being taken). (e) On June 6 Abel describes the Advts. to Bullinger as "the Queen's command respecting the cap and surplice" (Z.L. 2 119).

(6) Abp. Parker's own references form an instructive series. (a) His metropolitanical visitation arts. for

25. Parker and Whitgift. 1567, as represented by the set for Norwich, seem to be an old series, and do not refer to the Advts., inquiring, e.g., "whether they use seemly and priestly garments, according as they are commanded by the Queen's Majesty's Injns." (Cardw., Doc. Ann. 1 304). But the "instructions to the Commissioners," which precede them in the original (Br. Mus. T. 1013-10), bid them "put in due execution the Queen's Majesty's eccles. laws, statutes, Injns., Her Highness' other commandments given and published in that behalf," the fifth item including the 39 Arts., "together bound with the Advts., fourpence." (b) In 1569

Parker in his arts. uses the same phrase as above, ending with "all her Highness' other commandments," and refers to the Advts. as "set forth by public authority,"¹ while Parkhurst, who uses the same expression, prescribes on Rogation days "homilies as be appointed by the Queen's Majesty's authority," found in Advt. 21, not in the Injns. (c) Convocation in the canons of 1571 recognised the authority of the Advts., though the terms of the references are restrained, as though the abp.'s modesty had led him as President to minimise what was in any case his handiwork. (d) On Aug. 21, 1571 (Corr., p. 387), Q. Eliz., writing to Parker, refers to her mandative letter of Jan. 23, 1565, and to Bps. Horn and Cox as Commissioners for the "observation of our laws, injns. and commandments." (e) On Nov. 15, 1573, Parker wrote, "order hath been taken publicly this seven years by commissioners according to the statute, that fonts should not be removed" (cp. Advt. 16 above). Here five points converge: (i) the action—"order taken publicly," (ii) the date—1566 (7 yrs. back), (iii) the agents—"Commissioners," (iv) the sanction—"according to the statute," (v) the subject—ornaments ("fonts"). (f) In 1575 Parker in his arts. for Winchester spoke of "Her Majesty's Injns., and other Her Highness' commandments, orders, decrees, and Advts." (Rit. Com. 2 418). (g) Q. Eliz. in 1573 stated that she had "caused at several times since the beginning of her reign certain Injns. and other Orders to be published by the advice of her clergy" (Strype, Parker 2 352).

(7) (a) On Feb. 12, 1571, Bp. Cox, one of the commissioners who assisted in drawing up the Advts. and signed them, wrote to Gualter (Z.L. 1 233), "The statements which are whispered in your ears by the contentious are most absurd: for instance . . . that there are some who make an improper use of the name of the Queen, and that the ministers who refused to subscribe to the injunctions of certain individuals are to be turned out of their churches; just as if there were any persons in England who would dare to frame laws by their private authority, and propound them for the obedience of their brethren." (b) In 1574 Whitgift (then Vice-Chanc. of Cambridge) wrote thus against the Puritans: "They note certain contrarieties in this Ch. as between the Communion Book [i.e., the PB] and Advts. concerning Ch. vestures. . . . But in these matters they are much deceived; for, as I suppose, in matters of Ornaments of the Ch. and of the ministers thereof, the Queen's Majesty, together with the Abp. or the Commissioners in causes eccles., have authority by Act of Parl. to alter and appoint such rites and ceremonies as shall from time to time be thought to them most convenient" (Works 3 510). (c) In 1584 certain draft arts. were presented to Q. Eliz. and endorsed by Burleigh, Abp. Whitgift and five bps. being signatories, and a marginal note in the same handwriting as the text contained the phrase: "the Advts. set out by Her Majesty's authority" (Selborne, Notes, p. 25). (d) The Abp.'s arts. for Chichester in 1585 referred to "Her Majesty's Injns. and Advts." (Cardw., Doc. Ann. 2 25).

(8) (a) In 1584 R. Cosin, then Vicar General, and afterwards Dean of the Arches, in his *Ans.*² to an said book of Advts., would or durst publish them in Her Majesty's Name, and as by her Highness' authority and letters, dated such a certain day, if it were not so; or that they would enterprise to forbid or restrain that which the law had so exactly charged and admonished?" (b) To this positive testimony of a great contemporary lawyer may be added the negative witness elicited by Sir L. T. Dibdin, now Dean of the Arches (R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. 1 160), as matter of agreement between himself and Dr. Frere, "we have no evidence . . . of anyone ever having tried to get a Prohibition or proceedings of that kind, to stop the enforcement of the Advts. on the ground that they had not got the Queen's authority." "No legal proceedings were taken by anybody with a view to establishing the invalidity of the Advts." (c) This was not because such suits were unheard of, or unlikely to be fairly tried. On the contrary, a memo. exists in Cecil's handwriting of a Privy Council meeting on June 4, 1565: "The Bps. complain that they dare not execute the eccles. laws to the furtherance of religion for fear of the præmunire wherewith the judges and lawyers of the realm being not well affected in religion threaten them." And the fact was that causes were frequently taken not only "out of the Abps.' and Bps.' courts, but even out of the Queen's Eccles. Commissioners and her Court of Delegates" (Strype, Whitgift 2 427).

(9) Hooker in 1586, in a considered letter to Abp. Whitgift, intended to be laid before the Privy Council, described the Advts. as "a decree agreed upon by the bps., and confirmed by Her Majesty's authority."

(10) The CANONS of 1604 (see further below, § 32) expressly quoted and reaffirmed the Advts. as authoritative precisely in that particular (the triple cope-wearing) on which they contravened both PBs, that of 1552 as well as 1549, and they implied the mandatory character of the Queen's letter by dating them as "published Anno 7 Eliz."—Refs. to later writers can be seen in OCM, p. 76, or Tomlinson, PBAH, pp. 80 ff., CAT 395 9.

(11) The validity of the Advts. was never tested in court until the ritual suits of the 19th cent. On

27. Modern
Lawyers.

Feb. 3, 1870, Sir R. Phillimore, as Dean of Arches (see Table II), in an elaborate Judgment, said: "The Queen refused her official sanction to the Advts., and left them to be enforced by the authority of the Abps. and Bps. They were strenuously objected to by the Puritans. Abp. Parker never suggested that they were issued under statutory authority,³ nor has any legal treatise of authority, or any judgment of a court of justice, pronounced that they were issued under the conditions required by the Statute of Eliz." This judgment was, however, reversed on appeal, and Lord Selborne, in his Notes, etc., written in defence of the later Ridsdale Judgment, said (p. 29) of Lord Hatherley's earlier dictum: "The authority of the Crown may be given to acts of State, the forms of which are not prescribed by custom or statute, without seal or Proclamation, or

Order in Council.¹ The doctrine laid down in the Purchas Judgment, 'that if the Queen's mandative letter preceded the compilation of the Advts., and if they were afterwards enforced as by her authority, her assent must be presumed,' is not, to the knowledge of the present writer, inconsistent with any previous decision ever pronounced." In 1877 Lord Cairns in the Ridsdale Judgment (CAT 110 20) pronounced, after a lengthy review of the evidence which had been very fully presented on both sides (the Purchas case having been undefended), "From all these facts, the conclusion drawn by this Committee in Hebbert v. Purchas, that the Advts. of Q. Eliz. on this subject had the force of law under 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25, appears to their lordships to be not only warranted, but irresistible." Those, moreover, who question the status of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (see Courts, § 17) have to reckon with the fact that we have the considered decisions, on this point of law, of great judges, including the three Lord Chancellors just named. And the question arises, Would any 'spiritual' court, in which the judgment of qualified lawyers had due weight, arrive at a different decision?

Sir L. T. Dibdin has made it clear that he agrees with the view of Lord Selborne, which he quoted as "the view on that question of law of, I suppose, the very greatest judge within many years that we have had on a question such as this" (R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. I 161, Q. 2444, cp. 2341, -67, -69). So Sir C. Chadwyck-Healey said (ib. 3 2, Q. 16040), "I cannot help thinking, again with very great respect to the very eminent man [presumably Sir Walter Phillimore] who takes an opposite view, that the Queen did take other order by means of the Advts., and that they have legal authority." Cp. also the art. "Vestments" in Enc. Brit. (15).

Objection has however been taken to this conclusion, and the grounds of such objection must be briefly reviewed. (1) It will be ad-

20. Objections Considered. mitted at once that the Advts. are miscellaneous (OCM, p. 78), but this is shown in § 22 n. 1 to be irrelevant. (2) That there is "no clear reference to the proviso in any of the correspondence" is (OCM, p. 78) scarcely a correct statement, in view of the extracts printed above; but the statute did not require any such reference, and in the parallel case of the App. to the Injns. it was not till eleven years later that any intimation was given that it was meant to come under the proviso (§ 10). (3) Again, it is at once admitted that the element "of administration of existing law" (OCM, p. 79) bulks largely in the Advts., and the negotiations which preceded them. But the positive presence of this element in the Advts. has no negative force to disprove the due inclusion amongst them of some "good orders decreed" in obedience to the Queen's command to "proceed by order." (4) Certain alterations were, no doubt, made in the draft (OCM, p. 79), by which a velvet glove was, as it were, drawn over the iron hand; but no one has ever judged the validity of the Advts. by the unauthorised draft, and the terms of title and preface appear sufficient as they stand; cp. § 23, (1) and (2).

(5) Special stress has been laid upon the assertion that "there is no trace whatever of any publication of the Advts. for the province of York" (OCM, p. 80). It must first be observed that, short of an actual copy adapted for York or a reference to such an issue as an event, we have complete circumstantial evidence for the fact. 1. The Queen's letter stated, "the like we will order for the Province of York." 2. On April 28, 1566, "the Queen's Majesty willed my Lord of York to declare her pleasure determinately to have the order go forward." 3. Phrases in the title and preface prove the same intention: "all persons eccles." (title); "the state eccles. to be conjoined in one uniformity . . ."; "against the laws, etc., of the Realm"; "brought to one manner of uniformity throughout the whole realm"; "the people"; "the consciences of her subjects." 4. Grindal in 1571 "actually adopts the very words of the Advts." (OCM, p. 80). 5. On Sept. 30, 1577, Bp. Barnes, of Durham, with others, "the Queen's Highness' commissioners for . . . causes eccles. within the said diocese . . . by virtue of her highness said commission to them under the great seal of England directed," enquired "whether there be any persons . . . eccles. that wear lay apparel . . . contrary to the Advts. and Injns." In this case, Church and State, Bp. and Commissioners, concur in recognising the Advts. as having force of law in the Northern province (see Wheatley Balme, Ch. and the Orn. Rubric, p. 78). 6. Grindal in his metropolitanical visitation of 1571 enquired (art. 7) among illicite as to the wearing of "any cope in your parish ch. or chapel," though he passed over the cope as lawful in kind in his Injn. for destroying unlawful ornaments. 7. It comes out in Abp. Sandys' visitation of 1578 that at Grappenhall there were in the hands of a private person two copes and two vestments, which, as both unlawful in a parish ch., Bp. Atherton of Chester had ordered to be "sold for the church's [beneficial] use," not restored to it for ceremonial use (Raine, Vestments in the N. Prov., p. 15).

Secondly, it was noted by Sir L. T. Dibdin (R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. I 184) that, when "the Queen took order on a former occasion in 1561," she "dealt with York . . . precisely in the same way," requiring Parker and his fellow-commissioners to "prescribe the same to the abp. now nominated of York, to be in like manner set forth in that province" (cp. Parker, Corr., p. 134). So far as we know, there is no trace of any publication of the Orders of 1561 for the province of York, but they were acted on, and no one can reasonably doubt that the course prescribed was followed out, even though in this case, as in 1566, no trace of the formal publication has survived.

(6) The omission of the references in the draft as to penalty has been misinterpreted. So far from proving that the Advts. had less authority, "the inference" (Sir F. H. Jeune, R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. I 122, Q. 1913) "was exactly the reverse." (a) The draft had only named suspension and sequestration, but Parker inflicted deprivation. (b) The Royal warrant under which Parker and his colleagues were acting in drafting and enforcing the Advts. gave power to punish by imprisonment, by censures eccles., deprivation, or otherwise (see § 17). (c) From Grindal's Register 110 we learn that the punishment for opposing the Advts. was "sub pona

¹ Cp. Sir C. Chadwyck-Healey (R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. 3 2), "I am not aware of any rule of law which would make even writing necessary."

² It should be noted that it was admitted by Mr. Frere (R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. 3 161) that on this point, as far as concerned evidence against the Advts., the Judges in the Ridsdale suit "substantially had the case before them as it is before us to-day" (QQ. 2433-8), although he had earlier (Q. 2246) spoken of "an enormous amount of 'new light' in Mr. Parker's book," published after the Judgment. The principal novelty was the letter to the Dean of Bocking (below). On the other hand, Mr. Tonlinson points out that in favour of the Advts. the following, among those specified above, are items not brought before the courts or noted in OCM—(4) a, (5) a, b, c, d, e, (6) f, (8) a; and there may be others.

in dictis Injns." So the "or otherwise" of 1562 is interpreted to cover the range of penalties expressed under § 14 n. 2. (d) A Royal pardon (Strype, Parker 3 154) spoke of some who "for refusing to wear such distinct and decent apparel as by public Order is commanded, by due order of law already are deprived."

(7) Two other misunderstandings occur in OCM, p. 81. Mr. Tomlinson has pointed out that, in its reference to Humphrey's letter to Cecil, "the Report here confounds two perfectly separate letters, the one undated and unsigned, the other as given by Strype, dated April 23, 1566." In the one (State Papers, Dom., Eliz. 30 63) he petitions (any time, presumably, during the year of preliminaries) that "the Arts. of the Abp. may some ways be mitigated before such time as they be fully confirmed." This is not "certainly subsequent to the publication of the Advts." but obviously prior. The other is in Strype (Parker 1 432), but, while Strype does not "omit the opening 'petition'" (which belongs to the other letter), the Report omits the closing petition, the words of which show that the writer acknowledges the Royal authority, for he humbly requests Cecil "to be a means to the Queen's Majesty to stop the execution and to suffer the book to sleep in silence." Also the extract from Earl's Diary (fol. 2a) is not rightly dated 1566, "immediately after publication" of the Advts., but 1564, or two years before. Moreover "the Archbishop[s] [no apostrophe in MS.] book" referred to really means the "Declaration set out by the order of both Abps." (Cardw., Doc. Ann. 1 231). So Bp. Cox required wardens to provide copies of "other books requisite, as Injn., the Declaration, and Advts." (Rit. Com. 2 407).

(8) (a) Certain expressions are quoted to prove that the authority of the Advts. was less than Royal. Parker wrote to Grindal, § 21 (1), of "these our convenient orders," and in a letter to the Dean of Bocking he called them "a book of certain orders agreed upon by me and other of my brethren of my province of Canterbury."—These have been partly dealt with under § 25 b, c, above. Here it may again be pointed out that these quite correct designations cannot properly be used negatively to disprove the correctness of other designations. The authorship was the Commissioners', the authority—it is here claimed—was both episcopal, ecclesiastical (as by Commissioners), Royal, and—on some points—statutory. But the possession of these kinds of authority does not depend upon the choice of expressions by which in particular documents they may be designated, but upon the really relevant facts of the case.

(b) Much less can such designations carry weight when quoted from Puritan pamphlets, mostly anonymous. They were "the commissioners' Advts." (Pur. Man., p. 91), and "the Advts. of the Bps." (Z.L. 2 140, 151, 163). But these minimising titles must be discounted by what we know to have been the obvious Puritan policy, "to transfer all the blame from the Queen to the Bps." (Z.L. 2 164). So Parker wrote to Cecil, "As for the Queen's Majesty's part, in my expostulation with many of them I signify their disobedience, wherein, because they see the danger, they cease to impute it to Her Majesty" (Corr., p. 237).

(9) The objection is made (OCM, p. 82) that "a comparison of the language of the Advts., which carefully abstain from claiming royal authority, with that used in those cases where the Queen took further order in rites and ceremonies under the proviso, suggests that had the intention been to take 'other order' the form would have been more authoritative." But (a) the words italicised, introduced as agreed matter to argue from, contain a highly disputable proposition. Lord Selborne and the Judges inferred from the title and preface, with its references to the Queen's letter, that they carefully claim Royal authority. (b) The Report confuses the two clauses of the proviso, and argues from the "further order" as to rites and ceremonies to the "other order" as to ornaments (see further § 8). (c) The comparison invited by the Report has been made (§§ 10, 15, 16) with care, and has by no means borne out the suggestion in the Report.

(10) It is further urged (OCM, p. 83) that "throughout the controversy with the Puritans, the latter always assume that the ornaments of the 1st PB of Edw. 6 are still the legal ones." (a) The earliest unequivocal case is that quoted by Frere (R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 129) from Heylyn's Hist., in which W. Reynolds, in a preface to a book published in 1583, wrote of the Edwardian ornaments as still in force, and went on, "I appeal to every man . . . whether every private minister by his own authority . . . disdain not such ornaments." So Robert Beale, clerk to the council, in his controversy with Abp. Whitgift, wrote that "divers ceremonies [meaning 'ornaments'] which were used in the 2nd and 3rd yrs. of K. Edw. 6 are by law in force, and yet now omitted contrary to law." He was, of course, arguing from the prima facie meaning of the rubric printed in all the PBs.

(b) The early instance quoted by Frere (R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 127) from Gee (Elis. PB and Orn., p. 158) seems less convincing when an introductory clause is restored to the quotation (as in Tomlinson, PBAH, p. 135) as follows: "What popish ceremonies you reject they are unholy, and what you will receive, that is good and orderly: you reject the vestment and retain the cope: you reject the alb and retain the surplice: you reject the shaven crown and retain the square cap" (Answer for the time, p. 30: ¹ it is cited by Gee as Crowley's Brief Discourse, but Frere notes that it "is not certainly written by Crowley"). So R. Johnson, a Puritan minister, and domestic chaplain to Lord Keeper Bacon, wrote to Bp. Sandys, "You must yield some reason why the tippet is commanded and the stole forbidden: why the vestment is put away and the cope retained: why the alb is laid aside and the surplice used" (quoted in Tomlinson, PBAH, p. 135, from Part of a Register). Now the natural interpretation of both these passages is that the writers are taunting their opponents with an inconsistency of principle, not an illegality of practice. "If one special garment is wrong, all are," would summarise their argument. "What rational principle," they would ask, "underlies your law and practice?" The reference to the "shaven crown"—not an Edwardian ornament—makes this view irresistible.

(c) If this interpretation be accepted, the objection depends upon instances so late as to have little value. By lapse of time so cumbrous a mode of legislation as that of the 'other' or 'further' orders was bound to give a handle to ignorant or half-instructed controversialists to take hold of.

(11) A last objection, real but somewhat indefinable, is the general impression that the abp. was disappointed about the Advts., and did not secure all he hoped. If he had all the authority he wanted in the letter, why did he wait so long? One answer may be found in the distinction between formal authority to order and real power to enforce. This point is well put in the Ridsdale Judgment (CAT 110 12), "It appears from passages in several letters that they (the Abp., etc.) wished the Civil Power to undertake as much as possible of the formal responsibility of promulgating and enforcing the proposed new order, and that they anticipated very great difficulty if, without that support, the principal share of the burden should be thrown upon the eccles. jurisdiction." From the correspondence we gather that Parker got just enough encouragement to go on, and the allusions to occasional support from the Privy Council confirm this. Moreover, such delay as is objected to as unnatural here has abundant analogies. An agent, who has a power of attorney in his pocket, will constantly delay action in particular cases where he feels he must secure the knowing consent of his principal as a matter of expediency. So Parker, as Dr. Frere urged before the R. Com., sought and secured the countenance of the Queen, but it was for the execution and enforcement of the law made or to be made, not as a pis aller for the authority which he had all along.

It has, however, been suggested by some modern writers, and repeated so frequently that by many it is accepted as

29. Theory of a Minimum. undeniably true, that the Advts., as well as the subsequent canons, only required a minimum, the 1559 OR (as printed) all the time expressing the legal maximum. It is, however, very hard to find any solid contemporary ground for such a view, so radically at variance with the policy of uniformity, which—however impossible to enforce everywhere in detail—was persisted in so steadily (cp. RITUAL, §§ 10-13).

In OCM (p. 83) two reasons "alleged in favour of this" are given. (a) The Advts. are contrasted with the 1552 OR and its negative form "shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope." It is not, however, pointed out that this very rubric was re-enacted in 1559, subject at most to the temporary suspensory effect of the proviso in s. 25 of the Act of Unif. If either the view taken above or the alternative stated under ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, § 5-8, be correct, the negative was already legally in force. In any case an express negative was unnecessary in the case of garments already disused de facto. (b) The "illegal relaxation" in Advt. 10 of the rubrical requirement as to frequency of celebrations and acts of communion in cath. chs. is adduced as "a parallel instance of a minimum." But is it parallel? To force the frequent repetition of solemn religious acts upon unwilling worshippers is a different thing from dispensing altogether with a vesture of statutory obligation, which was moreover a mere thing indifferent. And was the relaxation illegal? The present writer cannot find anything in the Act Primo Elizabethae to cover the subject-matter of the rubric in question (see further, RITUAL, § 172), which would therefore be properly within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners. (c) The retention of certain copes in the Lincoln diocese has also been adduced as evidence that it was not intended to prohibit copes in parish churches. The fact is undoubted—as indeed the partial requirement of copes by Advts. and canons shows—that the cope, not having been a "Mass vestment," was less objected to than the chasuble, and as a rule was not regarded as a monument of superstition. There is, however, no evidence of the wearing of copes in parish churches, and only one instance of permission to retain after the issue of the Advts. Bp. Bullingham, however, one of the signatories of the Advts., could hardly have accepted the printed OR as establishing the 1549 ornaments as the legal maximum, or he would not at this visitation in 1556 have made the statutory maximum impossible of achievement by ordering the wholesale destruction of the necessary vestments, just as the year before at King's, Cambridge, he had had both copes and vestments destroyed. Moreover, his fellow-Commissioner, Archdeacon Aylmer, was known later, when Bp. of London, as active on behalf of strict law. (See further, on canons, § 32, below.)

The view taken in the Ridsdale Judgment, that the Advts. changed the law, and for the first time made the cope illegal in parish churches and the Euch. vestments illegal everywhere, naturally became discredited when it was realised that these ornaments had been treated as if they were illegal since 1559, and that the surplice alone had been required. But this discovery indirectly led to the discrediting of the legal authority of the Advts. relating to ornaments. This is not, we have tried to show above, borne out by the balance of evidence. It is, however, now agreed that, as Dr. Frere said (R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 176), "the policy of trying to get a uniform use of the surplice was earlier than the Advts. I feel that the Advts. made really no difference, except that they said, We are going to insist on the surplice." The view taken here is that they did make this difference, that they for the first time legalised the peculiar ceremonial use of three copes (instead of one cope and two tunicles) with surplices (instead of the alb required by the 1549 usage) for the principal minister, gospeller, and epistoler, in cath. and collegiate churches. This novel arrangement was apparently introduced in 1559 as an experiment at the Queen's instigation. Its merit, presumably, was that it dispensed with the "vestis sacerdotalis"—the chasuble, while affording a dignified and splendid, if not very convenient, dress, and that no distinction was made as to vesture between the minister of the sacrament and the ministers of the word. But the new use never established itself (cp. OCR, p. 85), either then or later. Moreover the express ordering of the surplice at HC in parish churches was not the permission of a minimum, but the substitution of the surplice for alb with cope or chasuble.

V. Both the R. Injns. of 1547 and 1559 and the Advts. of 1566 contain slight evidence of the principal exception made to the principle of ritual uniformity, i.e., in the special provisions for greater elaboration in cath. and collegiate churches. This is more fully borne out by various ordinances expressly relating to these.

Goode (Aids, 1851, p. 8) points out that "Cath. and Collegiate bodies have peculiar statutes of their own, in some of which certain usages of this kind (i.e., as to bowing and turning) are prescribed; and it appears that from the first exceptions were made in some matters of this kind in favour of Cath. and Collegiate churches. And it was the permitted continuance of certain usages in the Cath. and Collegiate churches (not to mention Royal and private chapels)—where their statutes, and the terms of their endowments, and (it may be added) the different circumstances of the case, afforded some ground for such a privilege—that led to their partial retention in some parochial churches." The same principle is further exemplified in Q. Elizabeth's letter of Jan. 22, 1561, where she requires her Commissioners to "provide . . . that the order and reformation be of one sort and fashion, and that the things prescribed may accord in one form, as nigh as they may; specially, that in all collegiate and cathedral churches, where cost may be more probably allowed, one manner be used; and in all parish churches also, either the same, or at the least, the like, and one manner throughout our realm." But it is only in the Royal warrant July 20, 1562 (reprinted by Tomlinson, CAT 107 5-12), that the authority for such statutes was definitely noted as within the power of the Crown under parliamentary sanction. After referring to the foundation of "diverse cath. and collegiate churches, grammar schools, and other eccles. corporations" during the last three reigns, "the ordinances rules and statutes whereof be either none at all or altogether imperfect or . . . in some points contrary diverse and repugnant to the dignity and prerogative of our Crown, the laws of this realm, and the present state of religion within the same," it requires the Commissioners (the quorum of six for this purpose to contain an episcopal member) to call in and examine these statutes, etc., and to certify "the enormities defects surplisages or wants" of the said statutes, and further to recommend amendments, "to the end we may thereupon further proceed to the altering making and establishing of the same and other statutes rules and ordinances according to the late Act of Parl. thereof made in the 1st year of our reign" (i.e., presumably, the Supremacy Act, 1 Eliz., c. 2, though by the method of procedure s. 26 of the Act of Unif., 1 Eliz., c. 2, might also be employed where the subject matter came under "further rites and ceremonies"). Cp. § 5, n. 2 above.

30. Conclusion as to Advts.

31. Cath. Statutes and Injns.

VI. So much has been already said elsewhere about Post-Reformation Canons, that little need be added here (see CANONS, and 32. Canons. ib. SOURCES OF).¹ The only series that achieved full validity was that of 1604-6. The degree of authority which they possess is estimated under CANONS, § 2. Some of them are obsolete, and have presumably been repealed by disuse, according to the well-known rule (§ 33) as to canonical as distinct from statutory enactments. Attention has sometimes been unfavourably called to the failure of the Bps. to wear copes, or to insist upon them in their Cath. churches. But, as copes were generally disused for at least a century, apart from Royal and State services not covered by the canons, without any attempt to enforce them by authority, and as the canons have not been constantly revived by repeated injunctions to read them publicly, it may be reasonably held that in this and in some other matters they have been practically repealed, so far as any coercive force is concerned.

In regard to the suggestion mentioned in § 29,

which applies equally to the canons, it may be pointed out that canon 14, commanding observance of all the ceremonies prescribed in the PB without addition or diminution, negatives the theory of a maximum and minimum use. And so the expressed aim of the Advts., which were intended to reform "all diversities," excludes such a view. Wheatley Balme, although disagreeing with the policy of uniformity, writes: "As a matter of history, the modern theory, that a maximum and minimum of ritual was intended under the eccles. legislation of the Tudors and Stuarts, seems to me to be (except as to the obvious distinction between cathedral, etc., and ordinary parish churches) absolutely without foundation; and merely an ingenious device suggested by the exigencies of recent controversy" (The Ch. and the OR, p. 30). The Advts. and canons did not diminish or dispense from the requirements of the First PB, but directly contravened them, as is shown in § 30 above.

Comparatively few, however, of the canons of 1604 relate directly to Ritual, principally those noted under CANONS OF 1604, §§ 3-5, cp. also § 9 on the duties of ministers, § 11 on churches and officers, and § 13 on marriage and divorce.

The other churches of the Anglican Communion have in most instances enacted a body of canons. Few, besides the Irish and Scottish, have dealt directly with Ritual.

Where the ground is covered by statute or by canon duly made and still valid, the only questions left are of fact or interpretation. But outside this area there are still the restraining or compelling forces of custom and common law. To custom great weight is assigned, both in the interpretation of written law, and in the settlement of points on which the written law is silent. The use of hymns and of the black gown and the scarf or tippet are examples of usages that rest mainly on custom for positive sanction. It has sometimes been claimed that the old canon law is valid still by virtue of 24 H. 8, c. 19, and even that it has since then had the force of statute law. But that Act really only continues on its old footing so much as has been received and is not contrary to the King's Eccles. laws. In matters relating to property the old canon law still largely holds good, but the accepted legal view is that this is because it has been continuously acted upon and so taken into the common law. It is doubtful whether in any matter of ritual it would be legitimate to plead the canon law as authority, and it certainly could not be enforced. The rule as to desuetude may be illustrated by a quotation.

"Those acquainted with the principles of Canon Law know that continuous 'non-user' or contrariant custom for a period of 40 years, if those who have authority for enforcing canons are known to have been aware of the non-user or contrariant custom, evacuates the obligation. It is this acknowledged principle which accounts for the frequently repeated repromulgation of old canons which we find in the Acts of Councils and Synods in the mediæval period" (Bp. Dowden, in The Scottish Chronicle, May 17, 1907, where he instances the tuncure as an obvious case in point). Cp. also Bp. Collins in Ch. Hist. Soc. Tract 34 (1898).

The invalidity of the old Canon Law in regard to Ritual is, however, placed beyond doubt by the last clause of the Eliz. Act. of Unif., which (it is necessary, here as elsewhere, to point out) is part of the PB, and has, since 1661, had full synodical as well as statutory force. It provides

That all Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances, wherein or whereby any other Service, Administration of Sacraments, or Common Pr., is limited, established or set forth to be used within this Realm, or other the Queen's Dominions or Countries, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of none effect.

VII. Where custom is not clear, the PB orders a definite remedy for disputes (see RITUAL, § 18, B2). "To appease all such diversity

Arbitrator.

(if any arise) and for the resolution of all doubts, concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this Book; the parties that so doubt, or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the Bp. of the Diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting, and appeasing of the same." It may be argued that the scope of this direction has not been fully recognised or acted on. The intention seems to be that this should be the recognised first step in case of ritual diversity. The diversity, moreover, need not be within a single parish; and, again, neither party need be in doubt, it is enough that they "diversely take anything." Neither have they any option; the direction is mandatory, "they shall always resort to the Bp." It is true that it is added, "So that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book." But this sentence merely makes it clear that an appeal must lie first to the abp.'s, and then to the King's COURTS. So, as a matter of fact, in the Bp. of Lincoln's case, an appeal was taken to the Privy Council from the abp.'s court. (See also FACULTY for the procedure where any alteration in the ch. is to be made.)

VIII. The decisions of the COURTS form an important element in RL. The two accompanying Tables present a conspectus of 19th cent. and later cases. (For earlier ritual suits, see Hiev. Ang., esp. 2 223 ff.) Some general remarks on these ritual suits may be quoted from the Report of the R. Comm. on Eccles. Disc., 1906, p. 67.

"The series of Privy Council judgments, which were given between the years 1868 and 1877, and which dealt with rites and ceremonies as distinguished from doctrine, extended to cases of ritual the objection which was felt to the Judicial Committee deciding questions of doctrine. The replies, evidently framed on this point in a settled form, which a large number of the clergy have made to the complaints of witnesses, well illustrate both the prevalence and intensity of the opposition to the present constitution of the Court of Final Appeal in Ecclesiastical Causes. The result has been unfortunate in many ways. Bishops and others have been naturally slow to appeal to a court the jurisdiction of which was so widely challenged; clergymen have claimed the liberty, and even asserted the duty, of disobedience to the decisions of a tribunal the authority of which they repudiate; and judgments of the Judicial Committee, though at least the reasoned statements of very eminent judges, are treated as valueless because they are Privy Council judgments. A Court dealing with matters of conscience and religion must, above all others, rest on moral authority if its judgments are to be effective. As thousands of clergy, with strong lay support, refuse to recognise the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee, its judgments cannot practically be enforced. Those who most desire to repress irregularities are those who have most to gain by the substitution of an effective tribunal for a Court which, because it is powerless, encourages rather than suppresses disorder. The establishment of a Court, the authority of which could not be disputed, would destroy any foundation for the claim now in fact made by a section of the clergy to decide for themselves the limits of canonical obedience." (Cp. also ORDER, esp. §§ 24 f.)

1868 M.M., Mar. 28. Martin v. Mackonochie (i), and Flamank v. Simpson: St. Alban's, Holborn, and Teignmouth, consolidated suits (Law Rep., 2 Adm. and Eccles., pp. 116, 215) in Court of Arches (Sir Rob. Phillimore: by letters of request from Bps. of London and Exeter). 4-6, 3, 10, 31.

1868 M.M., Dec. 23. Martin v. Mackonochie (L.R.,

- 2 Privy Council Cases, p. 365) before Jud. Comm. of P.C.: appeal by promoter on points judged legal (L. Chanc. Cairns, Abp. Thomson, Lords Chelmsford and Westbury, Sir Wm. Erle, Sir Jas. Colville). 5, 31.
- The Respondent was represented by counsel in both courts, but was condemned on all points.
- 1870 S.W. Sumner v. Wix: Swanmore, dis. of Winch. (L.R., 3 Adm. and Eccles., p. 58) in Court of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore). 6, 33.
- Defendant appeared by counsel, but lodged no appeal.
- 1870 E.P. Elphinstone v. Purchas: St. Jas. Chapel, Brighton (L.R., 3 Adm. and Eccles., p. 66) in Court of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore): by letters of request from the Bp. of Chichester. 1-4, 6, 8-9, 11-25, 31, 33-35, 38-49, 62, 68.
- Defendant did not appear by counsel or defend the case personally. Vestments, mixed chalice, eastward position, and wafer-bread were sanctioned.
- 1871 H.P. Hebbert v. Purchas: new promoter vice Elphinstone deceased (L.R., Pr. Council cases, p. 605) before Jud. Comm. (L. Chanc. Hatherley, Abp. Thomson, Bp. Jackson, Lord Chelmsford). 8, 24-25, 42, 44-45, 47.
- Sir R. Phillimore's judgment was reversed on all the points.
- 1873 W.B. White v. Bowron: St. Barnabas', Pimlico (L.R., 4 Adm. and Eccles., p. 207) in the Consistory Court of London (Dr. Tristram). 57.
- 1874 M.M. Martin v. Mackonochie (ii): St. Alban's, Holborn (L.R., 4 Adm. and Eccles., p. 279) in Court of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore): by letters of request from Bp. of London. 1, 12, 20-21, 24-25, 34, 39, 43-45, 51-53.
- The Judge considered himself bound by 1871 H.P. to condemn, suggesting that any new argument should be addressed to the Privy Council itself. But defendant, who appeared by counsel, and was admonished and suspended for six weeks, did not appeal.
- 1874 B.P. Boyd v. Philpotts: Exeter Cath. (L.R., 4 Adm. and Eccles., p. 297) in Court of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore). 58.
- Bp. Philpotts as visitor, sitting with Mr. Justice Keating as assessor, had condemned a sculptured reredos. Sir R. Phillimore reversed this decision, and ruled that the Bp. could not order the removal.
- 1875 P.B. Philpotts v. Boyd (L.R., Pr. Council Cases, p. 435), before Jud. Comm. (Lords Hatherley, Penzance, and Selborne, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Sir Mont. Smith, Sir Rob. Collier). 58.
- The particular reredos was pronounced lawful as decoration: but the jurisdiction of the Bp. was affirmed as against Sir R. Phillimore.
- 1875 M.D. Masters v. Durst: St. Margaret's, King's Lynn, in Court of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore). 66.
- 1876 M.D. Durst v. Masters (L.R., 1 Prob. Div., pp. 123, 373), before the Jud. Comm. (L. Chanc. Cairns, Lords Hatherley and Penzance, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Mont. Smith). 66.
- 1876 C.R. Clifton v. Ridsdale (L.R., 1 Prob. Div., p. 316) in Court of Arches [held to be so in Ex Parte Dale and Ex Parte Enraght, 6 Q. Bench Div., p. 376] (Lord Penzance). 1, 5, 8, 12, 24-26, 31, 44-45, 60, 69.
- Defendant appeared by counsel, and was condemned on all points, but appealed to Privy Council in regard to vestments, Eastward position, wafer bread, and crucifix on screen.
- 1877 R. C. Ridsdale v. Clifton (L.R., 2 Prob. Div., p. 276) before Jud. Comm. (L. Chanc. Cairns, Lord Selborne, Sir Jas. Colville, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Sir R. Phillimore, Lord Justice James, Sir M. Smith, Sir R. Collier, Sir Baliol Brett, Sir R. Amphlett); assessors—Abp. Tait, and Bps. Durnford, Hughes, Woodford, and Basil Jones). 24-25, 44-45, 69.
- The Eastward position without concealment of manual acts was sanctioned; the other acts condemned. Three Judges later disclosed the fact of their dissentience.
- (Sturge points out, Crisis, p. 34, that "the suits in which five clergymen—Dale, Tooth, Green, Enraght, and Bell-Cox—were committed to prison for contempt, were all undefended," that "the offences charged were similar to those in the earlier cases," and that "the later suits have no importance as to the law of Ritual").
- 1878 B.F. Bradford v. Fry: St. James's, Hatcham (L.R., 4 Prob. Div., p. 93), in Court of Arches (Lord Penzance: on appeal from Chanc. of Roch.). 61.
- 1885 Liv. St. Agnes, Toxteth, in the Consistory Court of Liverpool (Dr. Espin). 61.
- 1887, Lon. Re H. Trin. Ch., Stroud-green (L.R., 12 Prob. Div., p. 149) in the Consistory Court of London (Dr. Tristram). 59.
- 1890 R.L. Read v. Bp. of Lincoln: St. Peter at Gowt's, Linc. (Roscoe's Rep., 1891, p. 9) in Abp.'s Court (Abp. Benson; Assessors—Bps. Temple, Atlay, Thorold, Stubbs, J. Wordsworth, and Sir J. Parker Deane, Vicar-General). 1, 8-9, 20, 22-24, 28, 31.
- This, the Lincoln Judgment, was in favour of two lights at HC chalice previously mixed, Eastward position throughout HC, Agnus Dei sung by choir, Ablutions.
- 1892 R.L. Read v. Bp. of Lincoln (1892 Appeal Cases) before Jud. Comm. (L. Chanc. Halsbury, Lords Hobhouse, Esher, Herschell, Shand and Hannen, Sir Mich. Couch; Assessors—Bps. Durnford, Basil Jones, and MacLagan). 1, 9, 22-23.
- Appeal dismissed, but question of lights ruled out.
- 1897 R.T. Re Robinson, Wright v. Tugwell (L.R., 1897, Chanc. Div. 1 85) in Court of Appeal (L.-J. A. L. Smith), 55. [This was a civil, not an eccles., suit.]
- 1899 C.Y. Lambeth Hearing before Abps. Temple and MacLagan; on request of several bps. 6, 29.
- The Opinion condemned the ceremonial use of incense, and reservation for any purpose.

RITUALE.—The name given by Paul V in 1614 to the book of occasional offices, styled previously obsequiale, sacerdotale, agenda, or, as in England, MANUALE.—B2.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

ROCHET.—A linen vestment used as a substitute for the alb or the surplice. The R. is a form of the alb, reduced in size, with tight sleeves and shorter in the skirt. Dr. Rock (Ch. of our Fathers, old ed., 2 17) describes "the rochette as only a modification of the surplice, as the surplice is of the alb." Modern custom has well nigh restricted the use of the R. to bishops of the Anglican Communion; but the R. as so worn has been much altered, chiefly by the adoption of very full and ample sleeves, which the clerical tailors have frequently detached from the body of the R. and tacked into the armholes of the chimere. This extraordinary device is a decided innovation of modern times. "Lawn sleeves" are the sleeves of the R. Palmer (Orig. Lit. 2407) says: "We do not perceive, in any of the ancient pictures of English bishops, those very wide and full lawn sleeves which are now used." Upon this point the picture of Archbp. Crammer in the Nat. Port. Gal. may with advantage be referred to, also that of his predecessor Archbp. Warham. (See St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. Trans. 4 214, 216.)

Before and since the Reformation rochets were worn by clergy other than bishops, by members of the Minor Orders, and by laymen; and they were not infrequently sleeveless. Lyndwode states that the sleeveless R. was at times worn by the priest at baptisms for convenience—"Rochetum. Quod differt a superpelliceo, quia superpelliceum habet manicas pendulas, sed rochetum est sine manicis, et ordinatur pro clerico ministraturo sacerdoti, vel forsan ad opus ipsius sacerdotis in baptizando pueros, ne per manicas ipsius brachia impediuntur" (Provinciale 3, tit. 27). In 1636 Bishop Hall of Exeter, in his visitation articles, inquired whether the clerk usually wore a surplice or R.; whilst in 1783 at Bledlow there was "a surplice without sleeves for the clerk." Sometimes the R. had wings falling from the shoulders, in place of narrow sleeves. The bishop's R. is the only church vestment specified in the PB (Ordering of Bishops), and is in reality merely a part of his outdoor habit, corresponding to the priest's gown. Thus, in the First Prayer Book of Edw. VI, the bishop, when celebrating the Holy Communion, was directed to wear the Eucharistic vestments "beside his rochet." Good illustrations of the three varieties of the R. alluded to above may be found in Essays on Ceremonial, Delamore Press, pp. 181-3. For numerous references to the use of the R. in Post-Reformation times, see Hierurgia Anglic., new ed., 1 (see index), 2 309.—R3. V. STALEY.

ROGATION DAYS (Feria 2, etc., in Rogationibus), the three fast days before the Ascension festival.—They seem to have their origin in the act of Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne in Gaul, who introduced processions of supplication ("rogations") in consequence of earthquakes and volcanic eruptions in Auvergne, c. 470. They were extended by the first Council of Orléans (511), and introduced into England by the Council of Cloveshoo (747). They are mentioned by the Council of Tours (567, can. 17), and apparently by that of Mainz (813; "three days with litania major"). They were found suitable as a time of intercession for the fruits of the earth, and were introduced at Rome, apparently for this purpose, by Leo III, c. 800; but Rome had already observed April 25 with the litania major (a supplication for the land), so as to take the place of the heathen festival of Robigalia on that day. The R. Days are found in the Missale Gothicum; they are Western only. The Book of Homilies contains two Homilies for the R. Days; the Amer. PB has Proper Lessons and two special Prayers; the Irish PB one special Prayer. (For the R. Procession see PROCESSIONS.)—G37. A. J. MACLEAN.

ROGATION SUNDAY.—A name given in the PB (Table of Movable Feasts) to the 5th Sunday aft. Easter, on account of the Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday following being ROGATION DAYS.—G37. J. W. TYRER.

ROME, CHURCH OF.—The Church of Rome occupied from the first a conspicuous position in Christendom. Even in St. Paul's time its faith was "spoken of throughout the world." In distant Corinth it used its influence to promote peace, and the Eastern bishop, St. Ignatius, speaks of it as "pre-eminent in charity." It was the Church of the Imperial city and the only Church in the West which claimed Apostolic foundation. It was the natural meeting-place of Christians from all parts of the world and so enabled them to test their agreement in faith with each other and with the Church of the capital. This at least seems to be the meaning of a famous passage in Irenæus (Contr. Hæres. iii. 3 a), which has occasioned endless controversy. It was associated especially with St. Peter, and Tertullian, who, as an African, regarded Rome as the mother church, takes the promise, "On this rock I will build my church," as addressed to Peter personally. True, there is convincing evidence that St. Peter never was bishop of Rome, though we may with good ground believe that he was martyred there.

That however was not the view which prevailed from the 3rd cent. at least throughout the West. St. Cyprian, though he stoutly maintained the equality of bishops, revered "the place" and "chair of Peter." Still, even in the West, the Roman Primacy won its way at first slowly. The Nicene Council (can. 6) acknowledged the authority of the Roman Church, but this authority is neither more nor less than that assigned to Alexandria, and is limited to the Suburbicariae ecclesiae, i.e. (probably), to Middle and Southern Italy with the Islands of Corsica, Sardinia and Sicily. The Western Council of Sardica in 344 granted bishops a right of appeal from the sentence of their comp provincials to the Roman Church, and this concession is made on ecclesiastical and not on purely civil grounds, for the right of appeal is granted to "honour the memory of St. Peter."

Even in the East the Roman bishops won great prestige. This was due partly to the instinct which with few exceptions guided the Roman bishops aright in the controversies of the 4th and 5th cents. They were not great theologians, but they represented the common sense of the Church, and inherited from pagan Rome an inborn capacity for rule. Leo I may be justly called the first Pope: he claimed to rule the whole Church by divine right, and he received a great deal of complimentary language from the Fathers of Chalcedon, whom he directed and supported in their almost desperate conflict with the Monophysites. How far however the Eastern Churches were from any serious thought of subjection to Rome is clear from the 28th canon of Chalcedon. There the Primacy of Rome is attributed to political eminence, and a primacy of equal dignity (τὰ ἴσα πρεσβεία) is acknowledged in "New Rome," i.e., Constantinople. In vain the Papal legates protested and Leo refused his consent; the canon was and is the law of the Greek Church. The efforts of Rome to extend its authority ended in the final separation of the Eastern and Western Churches.

In the West the Papal power grew apace. It owed much to the False Decretals which contained among other things a series of letters bearing the names of Roman bishops from Clement in the 1st cent. to Gregory II in the 8th. Of these letters nearly a hundred were forgeries. They were of Frankish and not of Roman origin, and their direct object was to protect bishops against the secular power and their own Metropolitans. Nevertheless, they conveyed notions of Church history extravagantly erroneous, and the transference of grave charges against bishops from the local to the Roman tribunal enormously increased the Papal power. In many other ways the Western Church tended to become an absolute monarchy under the Pope. No Metropolitan could exercise jurisdiction till he had received the PALLIUM from Rome. If an episcopal appointment was declared invalid, the Pope nominated. So it was with a see left vacant by the translation of its previous occupant. In order that the Pope might make provision for ecclesiastics favoured by him, benefices and afterwards bishoprics were in certain cases reserved to him. Occupants of primatial sees such as that of Canterbury were legati nati, i.e., ex-officio representatives of the Pope. Still more oppressive was the intrusion of legates a latere, who were chosen by the Pope to regulate the affairs of national Churches. Popes like Gregory VII, Innocent III and Boniface VIII asserted their power to depose emperors and kings, and the authority of the State was subjected to that of the Papacy. Practically the deposing power of the Popes was silently abandoned. On the other hand, the spiritual autocracy culminated in the Vatican Council of 1869. It decreed the Pope's infallibility when, as supreme teacher, he defines matters of faith or morals. He is said to have a jurisdiction which is "ordinary and immediate" over pastors and people. In effect this sweeps away the whole episcopal system and reduces bishops to the rank of Papal delegates. The bishops have almost unlimited power in their dioceses, for the rights of parish priests and chapters have been to a great extent annulled, while each bishop is the mere creature of the Pope.

The Pope governs the Church chiefly through the Roman Congregations, fifteen of which were instituted by Sixtus V, and are composed of cardinals and theologians living in Rome. Such are the Congregation of the Council which interprets the decrees of Trent, of Propaganda for the government of countries which are not Roman Catholic, of the Index, of the Inquisition, etc., etc. The chief liturgical books are the Breviary for choir offices such as Mattins and Vespers, the Missal for the Mass, the Pontifical for Orders, Confirmation, etc., the Rituale for administration of the Sacraments so far as it is possible by simple priests. No single book answers to our Common Prayer.

A Roman Catholic is bound not only by the decrees of general councils but also by many Papal decisions, e.g., against the Jansenists, and he stands face to face in the Breviary and Missal with devotions to the physical heart of our Lord, to the holy house borne through the air from Nazareth to Loretto, to the Virgin as "our life," "our hope," "the refuge of sinners," as also with the Jesuit casuistry, which rules every confessional, etc., etc. There is a vast practical system which demands his respect, and rightly so on RC. principles. The Raccolta or Collection of indulgenced prayers, or such books as St. Liguori's Glories of Mary, convey a good idea of popular devotion.

In 1534 the Church of England cut itself loose from Rome. This was not a sudden step. In 3. Anglican Position.

Saxon times St. Dunstan refused to obey a Papal sentence. William I forbade the publication of Papal letters unless approved by him. No legate could enter England without the King's leave. The Statute of Provisors (1351 and 1390) protected the rights of the English patrons and clergy; the Statute of PRÆMUNIRE (1393) outlawed persons who brought in Papal bulls prejudicial to the King's regality. These are but the most notable instances out of many. The Papal remnant in England was ruled by an arch-priest and then by a vicar apostolic, with authority over all England. From the time of James II there were four vicars apostolic with assigned districts. In 1850 a hierarchy was established, but the priests still retained the status of mere "missionaries," so that there are no parish priests. There is one Metropolitan¹ with fifteen suffragans. The RC. Church in England was replenished by the Irish immigration, especially from about 1840 and onwards. The expulsion of the religious orders from Germany and France in later years has added to the number of the clergy. Chiefly on this account the priests in Great Britain number 4,240, whereas in 1885 they did not exceed 2,198. There are 1,310 churches or chapels. There is no religious census in England, but, from the returns of the registrar of marriages, it seems that the increase of Roman Catholics scarcely keeps pace with the increase of the population.

ROMISH DOCTRINE (Doctrina Romanensium). The 22nd Art. repudiates "the Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons" (i.e., indulgences), "worshipping and adoration as well of images as of relics, and also invocation of saints," as "a fond thing vainly invented and grounded on no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God." In its original form this Art. condemned "the doctrine of school authors (scholasticorum)," the change of language being made in 1563. What is meant by "Romish"? The word occurs nowhere else in our formularies, and its meaning has been much disputed. The following are the chief points to note.

(1) The Art. is not aimed directly at the definitions of Trent. The Art., as it stands, was drawn up in Jan. and Feb. of 1563, whereas the subjects mentioned in the Art. were not discussed at Trent till Dec. of that same year. One exception however should be made. As early as Sept., 1562, the Council had approved the custom followed "in some masses," where the priest, though he offers the sacrifice to God, still implores "the patronage of the saints."

(2) The word Romanensis is used by Hutten and Luther to describe an extreme section of the Latin Church. On the other hand, Calvin (Instit. iv. 2 3, 4, and passim) employs it as equivalent to our term Roman Catholic. Jewel applies it to the Pope, and Cramer to the official doctrine of the Roman Church on transubstantiation. The change of meaning was quite natural. After the reformers had been driven out from their former communion and national churches arose, those who remained under Papal rule became obviously and thoroughly Roman.

(3) The teaching formulated at Trent on the subjects which the Art. enumerates was just what the schoolmen had already taught. The Art. condemns the Tridentine doctrine by anticipation. The Art. does not condemn current practice, which the Council itself admits to have been defective, but "doctrine." Now the Council affirmed the doctrine of the Middle Ages which was familiar to everybody, and hence in Sess. xxv there was scarcely the faintest show of difference or dispute.

(4) As regards invocation of saints in particular, nothing is gained by distinguishing between merely asking the saints to pray for us and begging from them gifts such as God alone can grant. A Romanist is not free to find fault with either practice. In the Breviary, which every Roman Catholic in Holy Orders is bound to recite, the blessed Virgin is invoked as "our life, our sweetness, and our hope," the Roman Church begs her "to have mercy on sinners," to "protect us from the enemy and receive us at the hour of death." Anything which can justify such petitions will also serve to excuse the popular devotions of the Middle Ages.

RUBRICS.—Rubrics are the official instructions in the PB concerning the performance of Divine Service, and are so called because in the printed editions of the English Missals and Brevs. they were inserted in red type to distinguish them from the text of the Office. In early mediæval times the ordering of the details of Divine Service under certain restrictions was left to the discretion of the bishop of the diocese. In the Salisbury Diocese the Tractatus of Bishop Richard Poore was his official explanation of the rules for use in the church in Salisbury according to the institution of St. Osmund. Generally, these rules were to be found in three books that were in constant use in the Church of England, the Ordinale, the Consuetudinary and the Pica. The Ordinale contained the R. of the Missal and the Brev., giving the opening words of all that was to be said at each service. The Consuetudinary described who were to say the Service and the manner in which they were to do it, while the Pica was a perpetual Calendar describing what was to be done when, through the varying date of Easter, OCCURRENCES of Festivals called for some special adjustment. In the 15th cent. Clement Maydeston's Directorium Sacerdotum was generally in use throughout the province of Canterbury. It was much fuller than the Ordinale, and the general character of its instruction was largely adopted by the Reformers in the PB of 1549. When printed Service-Books came into use, then a return was made to the shorter directions of the Ordinale. Our earliest printed Service-Book which contains the R. in sections bef. the Offices is a Sarum Brev. of 1501. From that date onwards we find the R. more and more incorporated into the Offices after the manner adopted in 1549 in the English PB.

All the R. of the PB rest on the authority of the two houses of Convocation of Canterbury and York of the year 1661, sanctioned and confirmed by the Act of Uniformity of the following year; and the Sealed Books contain all at present included in our present PB except the Accession Service and the 39 Articles, which latter appendix forms indeed no part of any Office of the Church. (It appears as early as 1680 in smaller type at the end of the PB.) The authority for the Accession Service rests on the Act of Uniformity of Queen Elizabeth (26 sec., 1 Eliz., cap. 2), the changes rendered necessary from time to time being authorised by the Archbishop of Canterbury through the Home Secretary at a Privy Council summoned for this purpose. The alteration in the rubric as to the announcement of Banns of Marriage depends on the Marriage Acts (26 Geo. II, c. 33, and 4 Geo. IV, c. 76), which allowed banns to be published at an Evening Service when there was no Morning Service, and custom has transferred the instruction that they should then be published after the Second Lesson of the Evening Service to that place in the Morning Service.

2. Rubrics of the PB.

The R. of the PB fall into four distinct classes, of which three follow the three earlier classes of information found in the

2. Classes of Rubrics.

Ordinale, Consuetudinary and the Pica, while the fourth has a character of its own and is distinctive of the 16th cent. It goes beyond any question of the Service and the manner in which it is to be performed. The people of England are members of the English Church, and the clergy now receive instructions concerning their duty outside the Church. The curate is to instruct and examine the children of the parish; he is to bring them forward for Confirmation; on sufficient notice he is to visit the sick at their homes; he is to admonish the people that they do not unnecessarily defer the Bapt. of their children; the HC is not to be administered to open and notorious evil livers; the Burial Office is not to be used for those who die unbaptised or have laid violent hands upon themselves. This class of R. also recognises that explanations of ceremonies may be necessary. The question of kneeling at the Euch. is clearly defined, the meaning of the cross as used in the Bapt. Service is explained, and the certainty of the salvation of the baptised who die in their infancy is assured. Time, however, has rendered obsolete some of the R. of this latter class. In the 16th cent. the officiating minister was the curate, the priest, or the bishop. The insertion of the title Minister aft. the Hampton Court Conference was an allowance to the scruples of the Puritans, not the sanction of the ministry of a deacon. The deacons are once mentioned with the churchwardens in connection with the distribution of the Communion Alms, and perhaps are included among the clerks as distinct from the officiating minister. The demand in the first rubric of the Communion Office for the names of the would-be communicants has by the increase of the population and the altered social conditions become almost obsolete. The power of the bishop to sanction one instead of two services in small parishes is undoubtedly lawful, though unrecognised by the R. of the PB. As far therefore as the R. in this class represent the social and religious conditions of the 16th cent., they have become or are becoming tacitly altered, and the only authority for the alteration is the general recognition of the changed conditions of life.

When the English PB took the place of the mediæval Latin Offices, the men who had said those Offices in Latin then began to say that which was practically the same Office in English. Much therefore was left to tradition. The Office was to be in the accustomed place; the Chancels were to remain as they were in time past; the Communion Service was to be said where the Lit. was accustomed to be said; while the direction that the ornaments of the church and minister were to be as they were in the second year of Edward VI implies a knowledge of that which had been specified in the First PB of Edward VI. At the end of the First PB of Edward VI there are certain notes concerning the decent ministration of things which for three years made it clear as to the ornaments of the minister. These notes disappeared in 1552, and were partly abrogated by the Act of Uniformity of that year and partly re-enacted by the Act 1 Eliz. Tradition and custom have always been recognised by the Church, and generally the R., while they are of supreme authority as far as they definitely establish a ceremony, cannot and never could be regarded as forbidding that about which they are silent. [See further, USAGE and RITUAL, the full text of the R. being printed under §§ 14-53, with the variants of the authorised eds.]—R.

T. SCOTT HOLMES.

RURAL DEAN.—A deputy of the Bp., called at first Archpresbyter, succeeded to some functions of the older Chorepiscopus in a country district. His general designation was changed to Dekanus, from a military or monastic derivation, and the district which he supervised was called Decania. The office was most fully developed in France under the full title "Dekanus ruralis" (Council of Treves, 948). It was introduced into England after the Norman Conquest; and in the 12th cent. is prominent in Ch. organisation. A seal of office was confirmed to RDs. in the Legatine Constitutions of Otho, 1327, but the R. Deanery was then made a subdivision of the archdeacon's sphere of jurisdiction. The RD. had visitatorial and corrective functions over clergy and laity that were varying and ill-defined. He was styled "Dean of Christianity" as presiding over the decanal chapter which acted as a rural "Court of Christianity," dealing with cases of morality and eccles. law in subordination to the Court Christian of the Bp. The "Clergy Submission Act," 25 H. 8, practically abolished any real authority of the RD., though the office remained and lingered on with occasional efforts for its revival through the 17th and 18th cents. Abp. Cranmer's Reformatio Legum proposed that each deanery should have a "Rural Archpresbyter" appointed yearly by the Bp. In the Conv. of 1562 time did not allow the discussion of a drafted resolution that the Bp. should choose as RDs. learned and judicious men, recommended by the Archdeacon; while the Upper House of Conv., 1710, desired to allow the clergy to recommend their own RDs. through the Archdeacon to the Bp. for approval, to remain in office three years. In 1833 the Abp. of Canterbury drew up instructions for the RDs. in his diocese, and since that date the office has been happily restored in all dioceses of the Ang. Communion as a most valuable and effective part of Ch. organisation. Custom now regulates the mode of election. In most dioceses the election is solely by the Bp.; in others by the archdeacon or by the clergy themselves, subject to the Bp.'s approval. While deriving their appointment exclusively from the Diocesan, the RDs. are according to Canon Law "ministri tam archidiaconi quam episcopi," and subsidiary to the Archdeacon. There is no fixed rule for the duration of office. It is held generally at the will of the Bp. for a term of three or five years and is renewable. The mediæval method of institution was simple oral nomination and transmission of the decanal seal. Now a formal commission, specifying the area of oversight, is usually issued by the Bp. The main duties of the RD. are to report to the Bp. or Archdeacon all such matters as they ought to know; annually in the presence of the churchwardens to inspect the churches, churchyards, cemeteries, registers, and glebe houses in the deanery; to notify to the Bp. the avoidance of any living, and see that the churchwardens properly provide for the Ch. services during the vacancy; to hold annually or oftener, and (in the absence of the Archdeacon) preside over, chapters of the clergy. The office of the RD. is legally recognised in many Acts of Parliament.—A3. E. R. MASSEY.

RURIDECANAL CHAPTERS AND CONFERENCES.—1. Mediæval chapters were held monthly for ordinary business, quarterly for more important matters. The members were the parochial incumbents or their curates as proxies and the Rural Dean as president. The publication of new provincial canons was announced, presentments were made, and inquiries instituted as to the conduct of the clergy and their flocks. The chapter as the Court of Christianity had authority in considering revenues of the Ch., tithe disputes, wills, etc., as well as in matters of morality and Ch. order, with power of inflicting penance and excommunication. Gradually most of this jurisdiction passed into the hands of archdeacons, chancellors, and other officials. After the Reformation individual bps., like Bp. Ward of Salisbury, attempted to continue these chapters. The modern activity of the Ch. has once more placed them in its regular organisation; and, though the chapter no longer acts judicially, it affords the clergy the means of meeting for brotherly counsel and for the advancement of new efforts for the good of the Diocese and Ch. at large. The Rural Dean is empowered to summon the beneficed and licensed clergy to meet in chapter annually, quarterly, and at other times, to discuss subjects commended by the Bp. or Archdeacon, or, failing such commendation, matters that seem to him to require consideration.

2. The recent institution of Mixed Ruridecanal Conferences of Clergy and Laity followed that of Diocesan Conferences. These latter were started by Bp. Selwyn of Lichfield after the model of his organisation of the Ch. in New Zealand. The constitution of the Ruridecanal Conference has been usually formulated by the Diocesan Conference with the sanction of the Bp. The scheme of the Oxford diocese may be taken as a type. The Rural Dean is president and convener. Ex officio members are the beneficed and licensed clergy in the deanery, the churchwardens and sidesmen, being communicants, licensed lay readers, and members of the Diocesan Conference resident in the deanery. Lay representatives, being male communicants, are elected, proportionate to the population, from each parish by "qualified persons" resident in the parish. ("Qualified persons" are laymen of full age, and females who have a Vestry vote and "have the status of a communicant.") The Ruridecanal Conference meets annually or oftener; it discusses subjects drawn up by the Rural Dean, who is sometimes assisted by an elected committee, and passes resolutions. One important function of the Ruridecanal Conference is to elect a fixed number, proportionate to the size of the deanery, to serve on the Diocesan Conference. The clergy elect from their own body; and the elected parochial representatives (only) elect communicant laymen resident in the deanery. It is thus part of a graduated system whereby laymen take their share in Ch. affairs.—A2. E. R. MASSEY.

SABBATARIANS.—The controversy concerning the observance of Sunday was occasioned largely by the publication in 1595 of Dr. Bound's book on the Sabbath, in which he maintained that the obligation to sanctify one day in seven was moral and perpetual and not confined to the Mosaic dispensation. This view was strongly upheld by the Puritans, and the stricter Sabbatarians were even accused of saying that "to throw a bowl on the Lord's Day was as great a sin as to kill a man." The more moderate party urged that Sunday ought to be spent to God's glory in religious worship and all but innocent recreations should be forborne. The anti-Sabbatarians affirmed that the observance of Sunday depended on ecclesiastical and not divine authority, and therefore apart from the hours of public service all lawful sports and pastimes were permissible and even desirable. The issue of a book of special Sunday sports by James I and Charles I in 1618 and 1631, and the command to the clergy to publish it from their pulpits, caused great offence to the Puritans and led to the deprivation of several of their clergy who refused obedience to it.

defined in the 25th Art.: "Sacraments ordained of Christ be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnesses and effectual signs of grace and God's goodwill towards us. . . ." Cp. Catechism, Part II, Questions 1-3. According to the Answer to Q. 2 a S. is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself, as a means whereby we receive the same and a pledge to assure us thereof." This agrees with the definition in the Art. But the 3rd Ans. says that there are two parts in a S.: the outward visible sign and the inward spiritual grace; cp. the first Answer.

This ambiguity in the use of the word Sacrament is very liable to lead to misunderstanding. The greatest care must be exercised to ascertain in any given case whether the word is being used (i) of the outward sign only, or (ii) of the complete whole, including the inward and spiritual grace.

The above definitions, which were formulated at the time of the Reformation, have a long history behind them, and in order to appreciate them we must now trace that history.

In classical literature "sacramentum" (lit., the consecrated thing) was used of (a) the sum of money deposited in court by parties who went to law, (b) the military oath of allegiance, and so of (c) any oath or solemn engagement.

2. History of Term.

Pliny the younger, writing to the Emperor Trajan about the Christians in Bithynia, says that at an early service before daylight they bound themselves "sacramento" not to do anything wrong. In all probability Pliny meant by "sacramento" "by an oath," this being his own word, chosen to convey the impression he received from the Christians he examined; but some have thought that, though he understood and used the word in this sense, the Christians had really used it in the later technical sense.

Tertullian and Cyprian, the Latin Fathers of North Africa (the first Latin-speaking Church) use it as the equivalent of μυστήριον (mystery—cp. the Vulgate Eph. 1 9), with a wide range of meaning—of either a religious rite or a religious truth. Augustine, however, while sometimes using the word in this wide sense, preferred to use it more particularly of those Christian rites which could claim New Testament authority. In one passage (De Doctrina Christiana 3 9, cp. Ep. 54) he contrasts the sacred rites (sacramenta) of the Jews, which were many and burdensome, with those of the Christian Church, which are few, easy and excellent, such as Baptism and the Holy Communion.

By the 11th cent. the number of sacramental rites was fixed at the mystical number, seven (Gregory of Bergamo and esp. Peter Lombard). The Roman Church maintains this use.

The Council of Trent in 1547 passed the following canons: "If anyone shall say that the sacraments of the new law were not all instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord; or that they were more or less than seven, viz.: Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders and Matrimony; or that any one of these seven is not truly and properly a sacrament, let him be anathema." "If anyone shall say that these seven sacraments are equal to each other in such wise as that one is not in any way more worthy than another, let him be anathema."

The Greek Church in its Orthodox Confession reckons the μυστήρια of the Church as seven.

The English Church in the earliest stage of the Reformation set forth three as pre-eminent, viz.: Baptism, Penance, Holy Communion (see the Ten Articles and the Institution of a Christian Man); but finally in Art. 25 and elsewhere she laid down that "there are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, i.e., Baptism and the Supper of the Lord," and that "the five commonly called Sacraments . . . are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles" (i.e., probably Penance and Extreme Unction), "partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures" (i.e., Matrimony, Holy Orders, and probably Confirmation), "but yet have not like nature of Sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God." (See separate arts. on BAPTISM, LORD'S SUPPER, and each of the five commonly called Sacraments.)

The sacramental idea is not peculiar to the Christian Church. In the broad sense of "certain prescribed symbolical acts," to which "a mysterious efficacy" is attributed, Ss. are to be found amongst all races and in every age.

Primitive races thought (a) to establish friendly relations with their god by offering him a share in their own meal, or (b) when they feasted upon the fruits of the earth, to feast in a sense upon the god himself, the Baal (husband) of the land who made it fruitful, and to assimilate his strength and power, or (c) by partaking reverently of the flesh of the sacrificed totem-animal (believed to be akin both to the god and to his worshippers) to become one with the god, who had thus given himself for them. In this last case the sacramental meal was one not only of union with their god, but further of union with one another. Every member of the tribe must take part in what was regarded as a rite of brotherhood between all who shared in the sacred feast.

At a later stage of human development, voluntary associations were formed for religious purposes. The Greek mysteries professed to confer immortality upon their devotees by means of sacramental rites. These rites were of two kinds. By the rites of initiation the aspirant for salvation was purged from uncleanness by means of water or fire or sulphur or loam or blood. His membership was maintained and his perfection advanced by partaking of a sacramental meal. (See Prof. Inge in Contentio veritatis, pp. 270-279, etc.)

of the deepest interest, as showing how universal has been the instinct to meet in this way the religious need of the human heart, great caution is necessary in using these analogies to throw light upon the purpose of our Lord in instituting His Sacraments.

Our Lord was by nationality a Jew, and the Sacraments he instituted are best understood when we approach their study by the way of the OT rites (so St. Bernard, Sermo in cænis).

Now the OT sacramental rites were covenanting rites. Circumcision was the seal of the covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17 9-14). The Covenant-sacrifice of Exodus 24, in which half the blood was sprinkled upon the altar and half upon the people, was followed by a sacrificial feast (v. 11). The Passover Sacrifice and Feast were attended, so far as possible, by every member of the Covenant-nation.

With the advent of Christ a new era began. The old covenant passed away and with it passed the old sacramental rites. A new covenant was established, based upon better promises. The central fact of that covenant was Christ Himself, the perfect Mediator between God and man, Who, uniting in Himself the two Natures Divine and human, by His life, death, resurrection and ascension made eternal redemption for man, and opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers.

In order that "the gift of God" (Jn. 4 10, 3 16, 1 Jn. 5 11) might be "conveyed" to those for whom it was intended, two methods were employed: (i) the Word; (ii) the Sacraments. These two are united in the Gospel Commission, as given in Matt. 28 19 and the present ending of Mk. 16 15, 16, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved," and are found in closest juxtaposition in Acts 2. The Pentecostal gift is followed by (i) St. Peter's preaching of the Word (2 14-36), and that by (ii) Baptism (37-41), and "the breaking of bread" (42-46). The same linking of Word and Ss. is to be found in our Church Services. In the Prayer for the Church Militant we pray that all Bishops and Curates "may . . . set forth thy true and lively Word and rightly and duly administer Thy holy Sacraments" (cp. in the Ordination Service, "be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His holy Sacraments," "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God and to minister the holy Sacraments"). The only rubrical direction for a sermon is in "the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper."

Word and Ss. convey the same gracious gift. The Word tells that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him . . . should have eternal life." It is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." The Ss.

are "sure witnesses and effectual signs of" grace and God's goodwill towards us. . . . The gift of God is made ours not only by the general declarations of his Word but by visible signs and seals of conveyance. The Word is like the lawyer's deed of conveyance, the Ss. like the signatures and seals, worthless as ink and wax in themselves, but the means of actual donation in their connection with the Word (see Dimock, The Doctrine of the Sacraments, pp. 18-19; cp. Hooker, EP. v. 57 4). Faith takes the seal and appropriates the inward gift by that personal appropriation which is warranted by the seal.

That the Eucharist is such a seal of the covenant is clearly seen from the Words of our Lord, which followed the giving of the cup, "This is my blood of the Covenant, which is shed for many" (Mk. 14 24; cp. Matt. 26 28, 1 Cor. 11 25; also Exod. 24 8); and the analogy between Baptism and Circumcision as rites of initiation, admitting into the Covenant-relationship, is too close to be ignored.

St. Bernard illustrates this operation of the Ss. by a ring given to invest an heir in some inheritance. "In this manner the Lord, drawing near His passion, took means so to invest His people in His Grace that the invisible grace might be granted by some visible sign. To this end were all sacraments instituted." Compare the following by a modern theologian: "The Water, the Bread, the Wine, are not bare signs. . . . They are the personally given warrants and witnesses of eternal realities; such that, as surely as they are used in faith, so surely are the blessings which faith seeks certified by God definitely, infallibly to the user" (Dr. Moule, Outlines of Christian Doctrine, p. 242).

The Anabaptists would not go further than to say that the Ss. were "badges or tokens of Christian men's profession." Some Reformers declared that the Ss. were designed only "to teach the mind by other senses that which the Word doth teach by hearing," the Gospel preaching to the ear, the Ss. to the eye (cp. Augustine, "verba visibilia"). The fault lies here in the word "only." They indeed teach to the eye, but they do more.

The Reformers did not hesitate to use very strong language as to the efficacy of the Ss. In Cranmer's controversy with Gardiner the Reforming Archbishop three times accuses his Romish adversary of "diminishing the effect of Baptism." The Romanists, in the interests of their Eucharistic views, drew a very wide distinction between the Ss. of Baptism and the Eucharist, whereas our Reformers affirmed their essential parity. They agreed, however, in the main as to the nature of the S. of Baptism; they differed as to the manner in which it conveyed the inward grace. (See § 7, vi, below, on "worthy reception," and § 9, on the sacramental language of the Reformers.)

The concise statements in the second part of the Catechism define clearly certain points of sacramental doctrine, and raise questions which require consideration.

7. In the Catechism.

(i) Christ hath ordained in His Church only two Ss. as generally necessary to salvation. That is, only these two are required to be used by the whole "genus" man; cp. end of Art. 17; cp. also Latimer, "The promises of Christ our Lord be general; they pertain to all mankind."

(ii) These two "Sacraments of the Gospel" have a distinguishing "note" which sets them apart from all other so-called Ss., viz. "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself." This outward sign may itself be called a "Sacrament" (so Ans. 2; cp. Art. 29, "The wicked . . . do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing").

(iii) But there is a fuller sense in which the word "Sacrament" may be used, viz., as including both the outward sign and the inward grace. In this sense he only has in the full sense received either S. who has received both parts (Ans. 3). What, then, are these "two parts"?

(iv) The "outward visible sign" in Baptism is not merely Water, but "Water wherein the person is baptised in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," and that of the Lord's Supper is "Bread and Wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received" (Ans. 4 and 9). It is the whole external action—not water only, but baptising in water, not Bread and Wine only, but the reception of Bread and Wine by the faithful—which is the visible sign. This is clearly seen when we turn to the definitions of the inward grace.

(v) The "inward spiritual grace" in Baptism is "a death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness. . ." (Ans. 5). This is a spiritual action, a change wrought by God Himself, answering to the action of the minister of Baptism. The inward spiritual grace in "the Lord's Supper" is dealt with under two sub-heads. "The inward part or thing signified" is "the Body and Blood of Christ, which are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful. . ." (Ans. 10). "The benefits whereof we are partakers thereby" are "the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of Christ as our bodies are by the Bread and Wine" (Ans. 11). Here again a spiritual action, the veritable taking and receiving "after a heavenly and spiritual manner" of the spiritual food of the Body and Blood of Christ by the faithful, corresponds to the outward sign, the action of reception of the outward elements; and the benefit to our souls from this inward reception by faith corresponds to the benefit to our bodies from the material reception of the Bread and Wine.

The Church of England in her formularies and services knows nothing of any virtue of either S. apart from reception. (See The Thing Signified, by J. G. Simpson.)

(vi) If, as we saw in (iii), he only has in the full sense received either S. who has received both parts, it becomes of the first importance to know how we may "duly use them." "In such only" (says Art. 25) "as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect." Ans. 6

("Repentance . . . and Faith . . .") and Ans. 12 give the teaching of our Church in her Catechism. With these agree Arts. 25-29. Note esp. "Such as by faith and rightly do receive," "the mean whereby the Body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is Faith."

"Worthy reception" was opposed to reception "ex opere operato" in the sense that the sacramental act itself acted like a magical charm, whatever a man's spiritual condition might be. This opposition was expressed in the original form of Art. 25, but, as the phrase was also used to express the truth that the Ss. are "effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men" (Art. 26), the repudiation of it was omitted in the revision of the Articles in 1562.

(vii) In the case of Infants baptised the condition is postponed, but not over-ridden (Ans. 7). They are baptised on the promise of both repentance and faith, made by their Sureties or Proxies, which promise, when they come to age, themselves are bound to perform. The performance is essential to the reception, in the full sense, of the Sacrament.

(viii) In the case of the Baptism of Adults, where the spiritual receptivity is absent, the inward grace is not actually received at the time. God has given the promise and the "seal," but, in this case, only when the conditions are subsequently fulfilled is the inward grace actually received.

(ix) It follows from the above that the spiritual reception of the grace of the S. cannot be tied down to the one particular moment of the reception of the outward sign. "Do not wonder that sometimes the thing precedes the S. (i.e., the outward sign) when sometimes it follows long after" (Peter Lombard).

The sacramental rites of Holy Baptism and Holy Communion are the ceremonial counterparts of the spiritual realities—the new birth and the feeding upon Christ Himself—and they use the recognised language of ceremonial. King George V was de facto king on the first day of his accession, but the language of the Coronation Service, if taken literally, would make him king only on the day of his coronation. This language of ceremonial does not, however, imply a doctrine to the effect that the ceremony and the action or fact thus set forth are necessarily synchronous, and we must be careful to remember this, when tempted to treat phrases in our PB services as though they had the force of formal statements of doctrine.

From very early times, it became customary to speak of the sign or seal in the terms of the thing signified and sealed. Baptism was called "regeneration," "illumination," etc., while at the same time it was recognised that it was possible to receive the sign without the thing (as Simon Magus), and the thing without or before the sign (as Cornelius). Our Reformers freely used this "sacramental" language. "There is such a similitude between the signs and the thing signified that they are . . . usually called by the names of those things whereof they be sacraments" (Whitgift, against Cartwright). They spoke of all who received the Eucharistic Elements as being sacramentally partakers of the Body and Blood of Christ, while they at the same time unanimously denied that the wicked and faithless received the Body and Blood of Christ really. So they spoke at one time of all who had received the S. of regeneration as being sacramentally regenerate, while at another they showed that the last thing they meant was that all such were really regenerate. What they did mean was that while the reception of the thing signified depended on the faith of the receiver, the sign or sacrament itself is the seal of a real donation. The gift is truly objective and independent of faith, and the receiver of the "seal" is responsible for what he does with the gift.

The necessity of Ss. unto the partaking of Christ is well set forth by Hooker (Ecc. Polity, v. 57). With a few words

10. Their Necessity. from this exposition (in an abbreviated form) this article may be brought to a conclusion.

"It pleaseth the invisible God to come near to us at certain times to communicate by sensible means his invisible grace. Grace is a consequent of Sacraments and is received from God himself. The Sacraments are necessary, not as containing in themselves vital force, nor as physical but as moral instruments of salvation, which require corresponding quality in the users. All receive not the grace of God which receive the sacraments of his grace. Ordinarily the grace of sacraments is not conveyed but by the sacraments, but they that receive it receive it from God and not from them.

"By the sacraments God distributes the saving grace, which is in Christ for the whole Church, unto every individual member. The use of these moral instruments is in our hands, the effect is in His. The use He expressly commands, the effect He conditionally promises. If we do not use the instruments, we have no assurance that we receive the effect. If we use them faithfully, we are not to doubt but that they really give what they promise and are what they signify.

"Each Sacrament has, besides a common element, its own particular grace. We receive Christ in both sacraments, but in Baptism we receive Him once, as the first beginner, in the Eucharist often, as by continual degrees the finisher of our life, the special grace in each case being obtained by the sacrament to which it is proper."—K5.

SACRARIUM.—The portion of the chancel within the communion rails, containing the altar, sedilia and credence table. The word was used by the Romans to designate a family chapel in private houses devoted to some particular deity, and also the adytum of their temples. It naturally came into use among Christians to denote the most sacred part of the church, wherein the divine mysteries are celebrated. It should be maintained with the utmost care and reverence.—R6. F. L. H. MILLARD.

SACRIFICE.—The term S., though it is commonly used of that class of offerings in which

1. Definition: a victim is slain, may be rightly Origin: employed of all offerings to God. Sacrifice may be defined as "the presenting of anything before God with a view to communion with Him."

The Origin of S. seems to be best explained, not by any form of Gift-Theory, but by the conception of a Common Meal in which the Deity and the worshipper both shared.¹ It is not necessary to hold that the sacrificial victim or offering was always regarded as divine. The Totemistic theory of S., especially in the case of the Semitic nations, is open to considerable doubt. The most primitive sacrificial idea would seem to be that of the Table-bond. It should be noticed that S. has from the beginning a very close connection with prayer. When once communion with God has been established through the medium of S., it becomes possible both for man to speak to God in prayer, and also for God to speak to man by word or oracle. Thus, from the first, prayer, word and sacrament are all closely bound together.

The Christian Gospel came by way of Judaism. It is therefore important to ascertain what were the sacrificial ideas of the Jews.

2. Sacrifice in OT. There are three types of S. to be found in the OT: (1) the Peace

Offering, or sacrificial feast, celebrated on occasions of joy or thanksgiving; it symbolised the friendly relationship between God and those who entertained Him at the feast: (2) the Burnt Offering, celebrated on occasions of solemnity or calamity; in this S. the victim was wholly surrendered or dedicated to God, and the notion of a repast gave place to that of the gift: (3) the Sin Offering and Guilt Offering; these were propitiatory in character, their object being to "cover" the trespass of the offerer, and so to restore communion with God; they culminated in the elaborate ceremonial of the Day of Atonement, and their piacular value was explained by the theory of "substitution."

There are thus three main elements in Jewish S., the eucharistic, the dedicatory, and the piacular. This order is historical, and the piacular element gradually overshadowed the others, so that in later times even the Peace Offering was regarded as propitiatory. The development of the sacrificial idea in the OT may be considered as a process of moralisation, and an awakening of the national or individual conscience to the need of forgiveness. At the same time, there was also a tendency to separate the ceremonial of S. from the religious ideas which it was intended to express. Both prophet and psalmist protested against the divorce of S. from prayer and obedience. But under the Levitical code there must have been great temptation to regard a S. which was formally correct as being also necessarily efficacious.

The attitude of our Lord toward S. was in direct line with that of the prophets, viz.: that S. is acceptable to God only in virtue of the spirit which it expresses. S. was not to be rejected but reconstituted in the Christian Gospel. There can be no doubt that our Lord spoke of reconciliation already effected by the offering. While regarding any commercial form of the Gift-Theory as untenable, he finds the primitive element of the rite to be the act of self-commendation, consisting in drawing near to the God with a view to the restoration or continuance of fellowship, which the after-feast symbolises.—G. H.]

His death in sacrificial language, or that He regarded it as propitiatory, it was to be "a ransom for many." Further, the shedding of His blood was the inauguration and ratification of the New Covenant. The S. of Christ was to be the point of departure for the new dispensation, and in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper that S. was to be solemnly commemorated. The writers in the NT also could only explain the significance of our Lord's death in sacrificial terms. Its piacular character is insisted upon in many passages; see esp. Rom. 3 25, "Whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood." The dedicatory aspect is also brought out; as in Heb. 10 10, "By which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." And the eucharistic element is to be found in the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. 5 8, "For our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ: wherefore let us keep the feast." In Heb. the whole subject is treated with great fullness. The message of the Epistle is that by the one perfect S. of Christ communion with God has been restored to man. Moreover it is an "eternal" S., and our Intercessor "ever liveth" to plead His S. in heaven. The existence of the heavenly "altar" makes it possible for the Christian to "eat of" the S. It is difficult to forego the conclusion that the author is thinking of the Euch. as the earthly counterpart of the worship in heaven. The Lord's Supper was at once a familiar and important fact for both the writer and his readers, and in it the S. of Christ's death was ever kept in memory. Further, in the Apocalypse, the heavenly worship is of the Lamb "as though it had been slain," and the central fact of Christian observance was evidently the model for the prophet's picture.

We have already seen that the Christian S. is the Death of Christ. Such a S. is to be at once the pattern of the Christian life, and the starting-point for Christian worship. In the writings of the Fathers, and in the early Liturgies of the Church, the Eucharist, as commemorative of Christ's Death and combining with the worship of heaven, is often spoken of in sacrificial terms. Mediæval practice and theory erred in emphasising the S. of the Eucharist at the expense of the S. of the Cross, which was regarded as availing only for original sin. It is against such "sacrifices of Masses" that our Articles protest. Yet the Prayer Book does not scruple to attribute a sacrificial significance to the Eucharist. The sacrificial instincts of the ages all find expression in our Liturgy. In the Prayer of Oblation there is the piacular element when we pray that we may "receive remission of our sins, and all other benefits of his passion"; there is dedication when we offer "ourselves, our souls and bodies"; and there is the thank-offering of our "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." Above all, in the Table-bond of Communion, we are brought near to God and to one another in the holy fellowship of mystical incorporation.

In conclusion, we may speak with Bp. Andrewes of the Christian S. as being "That Sacrifice but once actually performed, but ever before represented in figure from the beginning, and ever since repeated, in memory, to the world's end." See also art. PRIESTHOOD.

SACRILEGE.—Properly the crime of stealing what is devoted to God's service; but extended to include any outrage to a church, to the person of the minister, or to the congregation in the act of worship. See Stat. 1. Mary, sess. 2, c. 3; 24-5 Vict., cc. 96, 97, 100.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

SACRING BELL.—Originally and properly, a SB. is a small bell rung at the consecration (sacring) of the eucharistic elements in the service of the Mass—"the elevation of the Host." Also, in Post-Reformation times, it was used to denote a small bell rung to summon parishioners to morning prs., or to mark the point in the Communion Service at which the people should go up to communicate. "He hath caused a Bell to be hung up in his Chancell, called a SB., which the Clarke always rings at the going up to second Service" (Petit v. Pocklington, 1641; cp. Drayton, Heroic Ep. 3 71, "Who would not rise to ring the Morning's Knell, When thy sweet lips might be the sacring Bell"). SBs. were often hung in a small bell-cot just above the chancel, with a rope enabling the priest or server to sound the bell at the proper moment.—R3.

T. L. PAPILLON.

SACRISTAN.—(Lat. sacrista, sometimes called secretarius; in the Gk. Ch. σκευοφόρος, always a priest.) In a Cathedral, the "Sacrist" is a priest-vicar or minor canon, appointed as his deputy by the treasurer. [In a large church the incumbent often assigns like duties to one of the assistant clergy.] In his charge are the sacred vessels, and other treasures, ornaments, vestments, and books of the church. He is responsible for their safety, cleanliness, good order, and repair. Before service it is his duty to see that everything necessary is prepared and accessible, both in the church and in the sacristy. He oversees the servers and other inferior ministers, and arranges that they shall be present for duty, unless he performs their office himself. At Lincoln the Sacrist specially attends on the dean, when he officiates.—A3.

J. E. SWALLOW.

SAINT.—The term "saint" is applied in the NT to all Christians, i.e., baptised persons, living on earth in fellowship with the local Christian brotherhood: they are saints in the sense that they have been sanctified, and are called upon to live holily (e.g., 1 Cor. 1 2; Eph. 1 1). The term is also applied in the OT to the holy angels (Deut. 33 2). In later Christian times, and according to modern custom, the term is restricted to the more distinguished members of the Church, and especially to such as are departed this life and are at rest with Christ. The Church has thus specially honoured the B.V. Mary, the Apostles, the Martyrs, and other great Christian heroes and leaders in the host of the faithful. Certain of their number are commemorated in the Calendar of the PB, and the days on which such remembrance is made are known as Saints' Days. November 1 is set apart as All Saints' Day, when the Church specially thanks God for His grace which enabled the Saints to attain their holy character and blessedness, describing them in the Collect for that day as "Thy blessed Saints," and prays that we may receive the same grace to follow their example and gain their character and reward. The appointment of the eight Beatitudes as the Gospel for All Saints' Day declares the Church's mind as to the marks of the saintly character, and the happiness of attaining it. The article of the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the Communion of Saints," indicates the fellowship which exists between all holy persons living and departed, grounded on their membership and union with Jesus Christ, the King of Saints. This article teaches that we on earth are in close relation to all the holy ones beyond the grave, as forming but one family and owning one Head.

Canonisation is a ceremony by which a deceased Christian is authoritatively declared by the Church to be regarded as in the first rank of saintliness in her commemorations.

2. Canonisation. The granting of such canonisation is now claimed as the sole prerogative of the Roman See, but this claim is not ancient and cannot be sustained. The two latest names of saints, in the order of time, added to the Calendar of the PB are those of K. Charles the Martyr, who was beheaded 1649, and St. Richard, Bishop of Chichester, who died 1253.—K2⁴. V. STALEY.

SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).—I. The first Saint's Day in the Church's Year (St. Andrew) commemorates

1. St. Andrew (Nov. 30). the first disciple called by our Lord. The Epistle (Rom. 10 9-21)

proclaims the doctrine of justification by faith, and the universality of the Gospel message. It shows that Christianity must be a missionary religion. The Gospel (Matt. 4 18-22) records the second call of the Apostle, his giving up of the fisherman's life and the beginning of his constant companionship with Christ, which was completed later at the ordination of the Twelve.

In the Proper Lessons from the OT, (1), Is. 54, foretells the spread of the Church throughout the Gentile world. Israel, which (in her prosperity) was barren, shall now (in her captivity) give birth and her seed inherit the nations. (2), Is. 65 1-16, declares plainly the call of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews as a nation in their pride and self-deception; yet a remnant shall be saved. With regard to the NT Proper Lessons, in (1), John 1 35-42, we have the first call of the Apostle, till then a disciple of the Baptist: his fitness for mission work is shown by his finding and bringing his brother Simon Peter. This call is a preparatory one; the apostles do not as yet leave all and follow Christ. In (2), John 12 20-42, there is a further promise of the gathering in of the Gentiles: the Greeks, the leaders of wisdom and culture, would see Jesus. Again it is Andrew who, informed by Philip, brings inquirers to Christ.

The Collect sums up the teaching of the Festival, and teaches us, like St. Andrew, to answer and obey the call of Jesus.

II. The Epistle for St. Thomas (Eph. 2 19-22) shows us how the Gentiles are fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household

2. St. Thomas (Dec. 21). of God, and are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets with Jesus Christ as the chief cornerstone. In the Gospel (John 20 24-31) doubting Thomas is convinced and declares the Godhead of Christ. Jesus blesses trusting faith.

In (1), Job 42 1-6, the first of the OT Proper Lessons, the penitent Job confesses that not by pride of intellect but by humble submission he has found God; now, as he sees Him, he hates his own proud and rebellious words. (2), Is. 35, describes the blessings that await the faithful people of God. Therefore the weak are bidden to be strong, and the timorous fearless: God comes. Of the NT Proper Lessons, (1), John 20 19-23, relates how Jesus appeared to the ten Apostles, Thomas being absent, and gave them the gift of the Holy Ghost. In (2), John 14 1-7, Jesus comforts His disciples with the promise of reunion in His Father's House. In answer to Thomas's despairing ignorance He reveals Himself as the Way.

The Collect teaches us that God's purpose in Thomas's unbelief was that we might not doubt, and prays that we may never be reproved for want of faith in the risen Christ.

III. The Epistle for St. Stephen (Acts 7 55-60) relates his martyrdom. Saul is present and approves Stephen's death. In the

2. St. Stephen (Dec. 26). Gospel (Matt. 23 34-39) our Lord foretells the persecution of his followers. Jerusalem and her Temple shall be left desolate until she acknowledges Jesus as the Messiah.

The OT Proper Lessons contain parallels from Bible history. In (1), Gen. 4 1-10, Cain, in jealous anger, murders his brother Abel. In (2), 2 Chron. 24 15-22, the people of Judah and Jerusalem at the King's command stone Zechariah, son of Jehoiada the priest, who has justly rebuked them for forsaking the Lord. Of the NT Proper Lessons, (1), Acts 6, describes the ordination of St. Stephen and six others of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, to take charge of the daily distribution of charity. It goes on to relate the preaching and miracles of Stephen and his arrest on the charge of blasphemy. (2), Acts 8 1-8, records his burial and the subsequent persecution of the Church. The dispersed Christians spread the Gospel, and Philip preaches in Samaria.

The Collect recalls St. Stephen's vision of the opened heavens, and bids us in trial look upward with his faith and pray in his spirit for our persecutors to Jesus, Who stands at God's right hand to succour all who suffer for Him.

IV. The Epistle for St. John the Evangelist (1 John 1) declares from the personal witness of the Apostle the truth of the Word of Life and the great message from Jesus Himself that God is Light, and that, by walking in that Light and humbly confessing our sins, we have fellowship with all Christians and cleansing from sin through His blood. The Gospel (John 21 19-23) gives the last words spoken at the sacred interview between St. Peter and his Risen Master by the Lake of Galilee, when Jesus foretold the life of waiting which lay before St. John. The two final verses are the testimony of St. John's fellow-believers to the truth of his record.

With regard to the OT Proper Lessons, (1), Ex. 33 9-23, gives the appearance of God to Moses in the Tabernacle and prepares the way for the revelation of the Incarnation. (2), Is. 6, contains the prophetic vision and intimation of the Trinity in Unity. In the (1) NT Proper Lesson (John 13 23-35) we see Jesus giving the sop to Judas at the Last Supper, revealing the traitor to the beloved disciple as he reclines upon His breast, and proclaiming the new commandment, "Love one another." (2), Rev. 1, sets before us the revelation to the Apostle at Patmos of Jesus Christ in His Risen Glory as Alpha and Omega, the Eternal and Almighty God.

The Collect fastens on the great watchwords of St. John's Gospel and prays that we may so walk in the light of God's truth as to attain to everlasting life through Jesus Christ.

V. The Epistle for the Innocents (Rev. 14 1-5) contains the vision of the Heavenly Sion and the song of the pure and undefiled multitudes, redeemed as the first fruits unto God and the Lamb.

The Gospel (Matt. 2 13-18) gives the story of the massacre at Bethlehem.

The Proper Lessons are from the OT only. (1), Jer. 31 1-17, speaks of the restoration of Israel; Rachel, mourning for her children, is bidden to dry her tears in the hope of their return to their own land. (2), Baruch 4 21-30, comforts the children of Israel in their affliction, and bids them be of good cheer in the hope of the salvation which is to come from God with great glory.

The Collect commemorates the death of the Innocents, and prays God so to kill all vices in us that, by the innocency of our lives and constancy of our faith even unto death, we may glorify His holy Name, as they did.

VI. In the Epistle for the Conversion of St. Paul (Acts 9 1-22) Saul, the persecutor, on the road to Damascus, sees the vision of Jesus Christ. He is blinded and led to the city, where Ananias visits and baptises him. He preaches Christ as the Son of God in the synagogues to the confusion of the Jews. In the Gospel (Matt. 19 27-30) we have our Lord's teaching that God is the Just Judge, who alone can reward rightly: many first in opportunity (as Judas) shall be last, and many last (as St. Paul) shall be first.

Of the OT Proper Lessons, (1), Is. 49 1-12, sets forth God's promise of light to the Gentiles. (2), Jer. 1 1-10, shows how God ordained Jeremiah to be a prophet unto the nations, and assured him of strength. In (1), Gal. 1 11-24, the first of the NT Proper Lessons, St. Paul asserts his Divine Call; in (2), Acts 26 1-20, he tells Agrippa the wonderful story of his conversion.

The Collect gratefully recalls the noble work of the Apostle, and prays that we may show our thankfulness for his wonderful conversion by following the holy doctrine which he taught.

VII. The Epistle for the Purification of St. Mary the Virgin (Mal. 3 1-5) foretells the sudden coming, first of the forerunner, then of the Messiah Himself. It is to be a day of judgment.

In the Gospel (Luke 2 22-40) we have the Presentation of the Infant Christ in the Temple (alternative Title of the Festival), the meeting with Simeon and Anna, and our Lord's human growth as a child in the home at Nazareth.

The Proper Lessons are from the OT only. (1), Ex. 13 1-16, gives the Divine instruction to Moses for the hallowing of the first-born to the Lord in memory of the deliverance from bondage in Egypt. (2), Hag. 2 1-9, contains the prophet's encouragement of Zerubbabel, Joshua and the people to continue their work of rebuilding the Temple. Though inferior in outward glory to the old Temple, its last glory shall be greater, for there "the Desire of all nations" shall be revealed, and peace—in Jesus Christ—given to the world.

The Collect combines the two Titles of the Festival, (1) the Presentation of the Child Jesus in our human flesh, and (2) the Purification, and prays that we through Him may be presented to God with pure and clean hearts.

VIII. The Epistle for St. Matthias (Acts 1 15-26) narrates the death of Judas, and the election by lot, after prayer, of St. Matthias to fill the vacancy in the Apostolic Body. The Gospel (Matt. 11 25-30) seems designed to remind us of the mysterious working of the Almighty Wisdom, of which the fall of the traitor and the choice of the unknown Matthias are part. We need to accept the invitation of Christ and trust Him: then, be the burden what it will, the yoke of trust in the God of love will make it easy to bear.

The Proper Lessons are from the OT only. (1), 1 Sam. 2 27-35, relates the warning to Eli of the coming punishment for his sons' unfaithfulness and the prophecy of the raising up of a faithful priest. (2), Is. 22 15-25, continues the same teaching: the unfaithful Shebna shall be deposed, and Eliakim established in his place.

The Collect records the choice of Matthias, and prays that the Church, being always preserved from false apostles, may be ordered and guided by faithful and true pastors.

IX. The Epistle for the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary is taken from the OT (Is. 7 10-13): the sign given to Ahaz is prophetic of the supernatural birth of the Messiah. The Gospel (Luke 1 26-38) is the account of the visit of the Angel Gabriel to Mary, his announcement that she was to be the mother of the Messiah, and the Virgin's humble acceptance of the Will of God.

The Proper Lessons for this day are from the OT only. (1), Gen. 3 1-15, fitly reminds us of the Fall, of the deadly enmity of Satan, of the sorrow and suffering which follow in the train of sin, and holds out God's promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. (2), Is. 52 7-12, sounds the note of the world's joy at the good news of the Incarnate Saviour; not Jerusalem only but all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

The Collect for the Festival, influenced no doubt by its position in the Lenten Season, turns our thoughts from the message of the Incarnation to the glory of the Resurrection, to which we pray to be brought by the Cross and Passion of Jesus Christ.

X. The Epistle for St. Mark (Eph. 4 7-16) sets forth the different gifts which the ascended Christ bestows through the Spirit upon men for the building up of His Body, the Church. In Him alone is true unity, and through Him alone comes the power of true co-operation which gives growth and strength. The Gospel (John 15 1-11) teaches through the allegory of the Vine the same truth: in Christ there is life and fruitfulness; without Him we can do nothing.

The Proper Lessons are taken from the OT only. (1), Is. 62 6-12, pictures God's ministers as watchmen upon the walls of Jerusalem, day and night proclaiming the coming salvation. (2), Ezek. 1 1-14, gives the vision of the four living creatures which the Church has adopted as symbolic of the four Evangelists: the human face (St. Matthew), the lion (St. Mark), the ox (St. Luke), the eagle (St. John).

The Collect records the services of St. Mark, and, recalling the words of the Epistle, prays that we may not be carried away with every blast of vain doctrine, but established in the truth of the Gospel of Christ.

XI. In the Epistle for St. Philip and St. James (James 1 1-12), James the Less, the Lord's brother, addresses the Jews of the Dispersion on the purpose, value and reward of temptation. In the Gospel (John 14 1-14) we have the difficulties of the Twelve: Thomas would know the way; Philip seeks a vision of the Father. Jesus gives the two great declarations: "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life," "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."

Of the OT Proper Lessons, (1), Is. 61, foretells the office of the Messiah and the revival of faithful Israel. (2), Zech. 4, contains part of the prophet's vision. The Church of Christ is seen as a golden seven-branched candlestick, fed by golden oil (God's grace) flowing from two olive trees, which are the two anointed ones (Christ Himself and the Holy Spirit). There is only one NT Proper Lesson (John 1 43-51—for the morning), and it narrates the call of Philip and Nathanael.

The Collect is based upon the above-mentioned declaration of Jesus Christ, and prays that we, following in the steps of the Apostles, may steadfastly walk in the way that leads to Eternal Life.

XII. The Epistle for St. Barnabas (Acts 11 22-30) gives the mission of Barnabas to Antioch, notes his character, enthusiasm and success, and records his companionship with Paul and their journey to Judea as bearers of relief to the poor brethren from their richer fellow-Christians in Antioch. The Gospel (John 15 12-16) lays stress on the life of willing sacrifice and the high authority of Christ's messengers, "I have chosen you and ordained you."

With regard to the Proper Lessons from the OT, in (1), Deut. 33 1-11, Moses declares God's majesty and love for His people and pronounces the blessings upon the twelve tribes, including that of Levi to which Barnabas belonged. (2), Nahum 1, again declares God's majesty and goodness and the coming of the messenger of peace and good tidings. In (1), the first NT Proper Lesson, Acts 4 31-37, the grace and power of the Holy Spirit are shown in the boldness and love of the Apostles and the little Christian company. Jesus, who has earned the name of Barnabas for his gifts of zeal and eloquence, sets an example of willing sacrifice and dedication. In (2), Acts 14 8-20, we have the missionary work of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra, Derbe, Iconium and Antioch.

The Collect notes the singular and exceptional gifts bestowed upon the Apostles, and prays that we may all have and use the manifold gifts which God is ready to bestow.

XIII. The Epistle for St. John Baptist (Is. 40 1-11) contains the prophecy of the forerunner; while the Gospel (Luke 1 57-80) records the Baptist's birth, the unsealing of his father Zacharias' lips at his circumcision, his naming, and the great song of thanksgiving and prophecy uttered by Zacharias; John is to be the prophet of the Highest.

In the (1) OT Proper Lesson, Mal. 3 1-6, we have the promised sending of the messenger. In (2), Mal. 4, this messenger is declared to be, in power and spirit, the prophet Elijah. Of the NT Proper Lessons, (1), Matt. 3, shows us the Baptist as the second Elijah boldly rebuking the vices of the religious leaders of the people and preaching repentance to the world. (2), Matt. 14 1-12, gives the story of his martyrdom: he is beheaded in prison by Herod Antipas in fulfilment of a thoughtless vow made to Salome, daughter of Herodias, who hated the Baptist for his fearless denunciation of her sinful alliance with Herod.

The Collect mentions the wonderful birth of the Baptist, his mission as the forerunner and his preaching of repentance, and bids us repent and imitate his holy life with its magnificent example of fearless courage and patient suffering for the truth's sake.

XIV. The Epistle for St. Peter (Acts 12 1-11) relates how the Apostle, imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, is released by an Angel.

14. St. Peter
(June 29).

In the Gospel (Matt. 16 13-19) we have the great confession of St. Peter and our Lord's blessing: he is Petros, the rock-man, and upon the Petra—or rock-truth—of the Divinity of Christ which he had confessed, the Church would be built.

Of the OT Proper Lessons, (1), Ezek. 34-14, warns the prophet that he is to go and preach to the house of Israel, though they will not hearken to him. (2), Zech. 3, prefigures the forgiveness and recovery of Peter after his fall. As Joshua the High-Priest, a brand plucked from the fire, was re-clothed and re-crowned with the mitre of his sacred office, so Peter shall be restored. Of the NT Proper Lessons, (1), John 21 15-22, contains the risen Jesus' solemn interview with Peter by the lake: he who had thrice denied is thrice questioned before his protestation of love is accepted and his commission given. In (2), Acts 4 8-22, Peter and John before the Sanhedrin boldly preach Jesus as the Christ crucified and risen again, and refuse to obey the command of silence.

The Collect refers to Christ's command to St. Peter to feed His flock, and prays that all Bishops and Pastors may be diligent to preach and the people to hear God's Word, and thus receive the crown of everlasting life.

XV. The Epistle for St. James the Greater (Acts 11 27-12 3) identifies the Apostle as the brother of John and therefore one of the Chosen Three, and records his martyrdom. The Gospel (Matt. 20 20-28) gives the request of Salome, the wife of Zebedee and mother of St. James and St. John, that her two sons might sit on the right and left of their Lord in His future Kingdom. The request shows faith as well as ambition: our Lord replies by foreshadowing the baptism of suffering which lay before the brethren, while He rebukes the pride and jealousy of His followers by showing that the true Christian ambition is not advancement but service.

With regard to the Proper Lessons from the OT, (1), 2 Kings 1 1-15, relates the destruction by fire at Elijah's prayer of the two captains and their companies sent to capture the prophet. (2), Jer. 26 8-15, describes the arraignment of the prophet Jeremiah by the princes of Judah, and his prediction of judgment to come if his innocent blood were spilt. There is only one NT Proper Lesson, and that (Luke 9 51-56) recalls the fiery spirit of the two brethren James and John, and their appeal to the action of Elijah in the first OT Lesson.

The Collect recalls the ready answer of the Apostle to Christ's summons and bids us show the same spirit of willing obedience.

XVI. The Epistle for St. Bartholomew (Acts 5 12-16) records the works of healing wrought by the Apostles in fulfilment of our Lord's gift to them at their ordination, and notes the increasing number of the Christian believers. The Gospel (Luke 22 24-30) shows human weakness in the ambition even of the chosen Twelve, and declares the truth which later they learnt so faithfully, that the spirit of Christ is the spirit of service.

For this Festival there are Proper Lessons from the OT only. The choice of (1), Gen. 28 10-17, the vision of Jacob's ladder, shows the Church's identification of Bartholomew with Nathanael, to whom at his call our Lord promised that he should see the heavens opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man. (2), Deut. 18 15-22, records the prediction by Moses in God's name of the Prophet to be raised up from the midst of the people to whom they should hearken, and suggests that it was this faith in God's promises which made the Apostle an Israelite indeed with listening ear and heart responsive to the call of God (see John 1 43-51).

The Collect bids us pray for the gift of the love of God's Word and the power to preach it, which God's grace bestowed upon the Apostle.

XVII. In the Epistle for St. Matthew (2 Cor. 4 1-6) St. Paul describes the obligations of the Christian minister. His renunciation of evil reminds us of St. Matthew's conversion and the manifestation of the truth of his Gospel which, hidden from the Jews who would not see, revealed to Christian hearts the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. The Gospel (Matt. 9 9-13) relates the call of the Apostle.

There are Proper Lessons for this Festival from the OT only. (1), 1 Kings 19 15-21, narrates the call of Elisha, his ready response and his attachment to Elijah. (2), 1 Chron. 29 1-19, gives us David's preparation for the building of the Temple, the dedication of his wealth to God's honour, the willing offering of the people and their leaders, and the thanksgiving and prayer of the King.

The Collect strikes the note of the Apostle's self-sacrifice; and prays that we like him may have grace to forsake all covetous desires and inordinate love of riches and follow Jesus Christ.

XVIII. The Epistle for St. Michael and All Angels (Rev. 12 7-12) speaks of war in heaven, Satan expelled by Michael and his Angels, and victory by the blood of the Lamb. In the Gospel (Matt. 18 1-10) our Lord proclaims that childlike simplicity and faith are necessary for entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven. He warns men against offences, and asserts the appointment of guardian Angels for His little ones.

Angels

Of the OT Proper Lessons, (1), Gen. 32, records how Jacob met the Angels at Mahanaim, his desire to be reconciled to Esau, his wrestling with the Angel at Peniel, and the change of his name to Israel because as a prince he has had power with God and man and has prevailed. (2), Dan. 10 4-21, describes Daniel's vision and the work of Michael on behalf of God's people. With regard to the NT Proper Lessons, (1), Acts 12 5-17, narrates the rescue of Peter from prison by the Angel of the Lord. (2), Rev. 14 14-20, speaks of the Angel-reapers, at the bidding of the Son of Man, gathering the grape-harvest of the earth and casting it into the winepress of the wrath of God.

The Collect sums up the teaching of the Festival. The Angels are God's ministers, and we pray that, as they serve God in Heaven, so by His appointment they may help and defend us on earth.

XIX. The Epistle for St. Luke-the-Evangelist (2 Tim. 4 5-15) is taken from St. Paul's last letter. It shows us the great Apostle awaiting death in triumphant confidence and the faithful comrade at his side: "only Luke is with me." The Gospel (Luke 10 1-7) seems by its selection to suggest that St. Luke was one of the seventy whose mission is here recorded. His own statement (Luke 1 1, 2), however, implies that he was not an eye-witness of our Lord's work, and therefore not one of the seventy disciples.

Proper Lessons are appointed from the OT only. (1), Is. 55, declares that God's word shall not return to Him empty, and then foreshadows the success of the missionary evangelist. (2), Eccles. 38 1-14, speaks of the honour due to the physician whose healing power comes from the Most High.

The Collect, referring to Col. 4 14, relates how St. Luke, the physician whose praise is in the Gospel, was called to be an Evangelist and Physician of the soul, and prays that by his health-giving teaching all the diseases of our souls may be cured.

XX. In the Epistle for St. Simon and St. Jude (Jude vv. 1-8), Jude, brother of James and therefore another of the "Lord's brethren," exhorts Christians earnestly to contend for the unity of the faith, and, by reference to ancient Jewish history and the rebel angels, warns them against the perils of disobedience. In the Gospel (John 15 17-27), Jesus warns His disciples of the hatred and persecution which must await them, and tells them of the promised Comforter and their work as witnesses to Him.

In (1), Is. 28 9-16, the first of the Proper Lessons, which are from the OT only, the prophet has spoken of the worldliness of the people: yet he will go on with his message, confounding the false and proud and confirming the simple-minded. God's Word stands sure: the believer will wait patiently. (2), Jer. 3 12-18, appeals to backsliding Israel to turn to the Lord, and contains a vision of unity and the gathering of all nations to Jerusalem, i.e., the Church of the Living God.

The Collect sums up this teaching of unity in the Church of Christ, built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, and prays that we through their teaching may be joined together and built up into a holy temple acceptable to God.

XXI. The Epistle for All Saints' Day (Rev. 7 2-12) pictures the sealing of God's chosen and the great multitude of the redeemed of all nations praising God upon the throne. The Gospel (Matt. 5 1-12) gives the types of saintly character as declared blessed by our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount.

The Proper Lessons from the OT vindicate the life of righteousness. (1), Wisdom 3 1-9, shows us how the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God: death for them is happy: through their apparent troubles on earth God proves their trust, and finds them worthy of Himself. (2), Wisdom 5 1-16, anticipates the vindication of the life of the righteous: the careless and wicked shall at last confess the triumph of goodness and the folly and vanity of their own lives: the righteous live for evermore in honour under God's care. With regard to the NT Proper Lessons, in (1), Heb. 11 33-12 6, the triumphs of faith are set forth as a spur to our own efforts: Jesus, who through the Cross attained the Crown, is shown to be our great example: we see the power of evil vanquished. In (2), Rev. 19 1-16, we have the final triumph: the Marriage Feast of the Lamb; the revelation in glory of the King of kings and Lord of lords.

The Collect gathers up the teaching of the Festival by proclaiming the unity of the saints in the mystical body of Christ, and appeals to us to follow in their steps that we may share with them in the unspeakable joys which God has prepared for all that love Him.—G.

SANCTIFICATION.—The word "sanctification" does not occur in the PB, but the Greek word for which it stands in 1 Thess. 4 3, etc., is the word translated 'holiness' in Rom. 6 19-22 (Ep. for 7th S. aft. Trin.). The word "sanctify," however, occurs frequently: in Bapt.¹ (4 times), Bapt.² (3), Cat. (1), Confirm. (1), Matrim. (3), Vis. of Sick (1); in the 2nd Coll. for Good Friday, and in the Eps. for 5th S. in Lent, Good Friday, 5th S. aft. Trin., St. Jude's Day and the Consecr. of Bps. (cp. Art. 12). In the PB the word "sanctify" is used:—(a) of things, in the sense of "consecrate," "set apart for holy use"; "Sanctify this water" = Consecrate it to be the "effectual sign" of the mystical washing; "Sanctify this thy fatherly correction" = Give holy virtue to this sickness that it may stimulate to faith and repentance: (b) of persons, for the most part in the Pauline sense given below, but once, in the Ep. for the 5th S. aft. Trin., in the sense "acknowledged as holy," "treat as holy" (cp.

Matt. 69, "Thy name be hallowed" or sanctified). In the Ep. to the Hebrews (Eps. 5th S. in Lent and Good Friday) the word "sanctify" is used of that initial cleansing from defilement and consecration to God which made worshippers perfect, i.e., acceptable to God (see Heb. 9 13, 10 10, 29, 13 12). In this sense it answers to St. Paul's word "justify" (see JUSTIFICATION—also A. B. Davidson on Ep. to Heb., pp. 206-7). In St. Paul's Epistles and in the subsequent language of the Church, S. expresses that progressive work wrought within us by the Holy Spirit, by which we become holy as He is holy. Faith, from the human side, unites us to Christ, and He is alike (a) our Propitiation and (b) our Living Head. The Holy Spirit, who has awakened this faith in us, takes possession of the believing heart and, from the Divine side, unites us to Christ, so that we become "One Spirit" with Him (1 Cor. 6 17), we are "in Him" (Eph. 1 1, etc., etc.). Two results follow simultaneously:—(a) as one with Christ the Righteous we are accepted and reckoned to be what He is (= Justification); (b) as one with Christ our living Head we are quickened and become living members of His body (= Regeneration). The life that follows is the life of Sanctification. This life is maintained on our part by continuous self-surrender and trust. The Galatians were tempted to think that, while they had received the Spirit by faith, they were to go on to perfection by their own diligence in observing ritual and ceremonial rules (Gal. 3 1-6, etc.). Many Christians to-day still make the same mistake (see Goulburn's Thoughts on Personal Religion, Part iii, Chap. 1). But the true secret of holiness is that we yield ourselves to God, so that the Spirit of life may work unhindered in us, and trust Him every moment to work out in us His own holy will (Rom. 6 11-13, 8 2-4, Gal. 2 20). Rites and ceremonies, accordingly, are not substitutes for inward self-surrender and trust, but precious occasions and means for their exercise.—Pd.

SANCTUARY (RIGHT OF).—Many early religious houses had royal grants of an area in which fugitives from justice or debtors could not be arrested, beside the canon law right attaching to churches and churchyards. Violation of sanctuaries was punished with excommunication. All privilege of sanctuary was abolished in 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 28).—A4.

SANCTUS.—The Sanctus, Ten-Sanctus, Triumphal (ἐπὶ νίκης) or Seraphic Hymn, is the hymn of the Seraphim in Isaiah 6 3 (cp. Rev. 4 8), generally with the addition of Ps. 118 26, "Blessed is he that cometh. . . ." It is sometimes in early writers called the Angelic Hymn, and so confounded with the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS (Scudamore, NE, p. 531). It is found in almost all the Liturgies¹ in the same place, viz., at the end of the Preface and just before the Consecration Prayer (cp. Prayer of Oblation of Bishop Sarapion, c. 350; Duchesne, Christian Worship, p. 76). The S. is one of the greater hymns connected with the Euch., the others being (1) the Trisagion, found in the Liturgy of Constantinople and St. James after the Lesser Entrance; (2) the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS; (3) the Cherubic Hymn, sung at the Greater Entrance in the Liturgy of Constantinople.

For ancient and mediæval varieties in the form of the S., cp. Scudamore, NE, p. 531 ff.

Our present form dates from 1552. In 1549 "Glory to Thee, O Lord, in the highest" was substituted for the concluding "Hosanna in the Highest" of the mediæval liturgies. The Latin S. is given in CANON OF THE LITURGY, § 2.

According to Cardinal Bona (Rer. Lit. 2 10) ancient Rituals order "that when they sing the Trisagion (here = S.) they bow, and raise themselves as they begin the heavens are full," etc. In the Roman Mass, "when the S. is said, all kneel except the Celebrant, the Assistant, if there be one, the Deacon, and the Sub-deacon, who stand and bow," and "the minister rings a little bell" (Rit. Cel. Miss. 8 8).

In the Pre-Reformation Service-books, and in 1549, the S. proper was separate from the words, "Therefore with Angels," etc., and the old musical settings are for the S. proper only. The words were printed as at present in 1604. The custom by which the people join with the Celebrant in the Introduction seems to be modern, but certainly follows the present text of the PB. And the Introduction emphasises the thought of our communion with Saints and Angels in the "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving."—H2.

SCHISM.—"Schism" is associated with "false doctrine" and "heresy" in one of the suffrages of the Litany, and Ch. History teaches us that from the earliest times the work of the Ch. has been terribly hindered by schism. "Schism" (σχίσμα) denotes a clef or rent, and is applied to a breach in the outward unity of the Church, whereas "heresy" denotes rather the existence of false opinions without such open breach. We do not find any complete "schism" in the NT, but the danger of it was already felt,¹ and St. Paul twice warned the Corinthians against "divisions" (σχίσματα—1 Cor. 1 10, of creation which was formerly made at this particular point of the Euch. service.

11 18, 12 25), and sternly condemns factiousness and party spirit (e.g., Gal. 5 20), which are the roots of schism. Schism arose in somewhat different ways; sometimes it was the external embodiment of a persistent doctrinal error, e.g., Arianism; in other cases the point at issue was less concerned with doctrine than with discipline or Church government, as was the case with Montanism, Novatianism and Donatism. In both types of schism personal ambition and self-will often played a part, but in the case of Montanism and similar Puritan movements there was a real desire to protest against growing laxity of discipline. The Ch. tried to meet the danger from schism by argument and persuasion, then by excommunication or conciliar condemnation, and finally from the 4th cent. onwards by coercion and the use of the secular arm (see HERESY). Theodosius and his successors set themselves to extirpate heresy (and, a fortiori, schism) by the severest penalties, and such schisms as Donatism were at length reabsorbed. Great controversies arose as to the validity of schismatical (and heretical) baptism, and the necessity of RE-BAPTISM. Re-baptism was strongly urged by Cyprian, but his policy was finally rejected by the Church; and this decision may be taken as implying that, though heretics and schismatics in some degree cut themselves off from the Church, their exclusion is only partial (Hooker, Eccl. Pol. iii. 1, v. 62).

More far-reaching than any of the earlier schisms was the great schism of East and West, which was completed in the 11th century. This rupture, which shattered the unity of Christendom, was due far more to the ambitions of Pope and Patriarch and to political causes than to differences of doctrine. Finally, after the great revolt against religious abuses and corruptions at the Reformation, men lost sight of the principle of unity, and the more extreme Protestants came to regard separation from the Church as justifiable or even laudable on the part of those who differed from her as to doctrine or discipline. The growth of this view, combined with the progress of toleration, has produced our present state of religious diversity. In England the majority of Christians hardly realise that, whatever excuses for it may be found in the mistakes or abuses of the past, schism is contrary to the fundamental principles of Christianity. WALTER HOBHOUSE.

SCHOOLMEN.—A name given to certain theologians of the Middle Ages, who in their lectures and writings reduced the doctrines of Christianity to a systematic form by the logical and grammatical methods of

1. Precursors. Aristotle. The decline and fall of the Roman Empire under successive barbarian invasions involved the decay of learning, the wreck of libraries and the destruction of the ancient schools. During the dark ages that supervened, the clergy, though zealous missionaries, ceased to be a learned body or the patrons of learning. Yet in the darkest times there were a few diligent students who, in spite of the lack of books and want of encouragement, never relaxed their efforts to discover a religious philosophy harmonising faith and reason. The writings of the so-called Dionysius the Areopagite, embodying the Neo-Platonic speculations of the Alexandrian School, and particularly the doctrines of Plotinus (A.D. 201-274) and Proclus (412-488), furnished them with the foundations for such an intellectual structure. On this basis John Scotus Erigena (b. c. 800), the most original thinker of the Middle Ages, founded his system of Theology, and to this synthetic or speculatively constructive school belonged the more conservative Anselm, whose Monologium, Proslogium and Cur Deus Homo essay the task of rationalising the leading doctrines of Christianity. The fault of all such speculative systems of religious philosophy is that they involve the certainties of the faith in the uncertainties of speculation. Each system rests on the reputation of its author, and is accepted only until something better supersedes it.

With the revival of learning which followed the reconstruction of the Empire under Charles the Great (742-814) the prevailing

2. Leaders. uncertainty about the co-relation of Christian doctrines and their intellectual setting became intolerable. All parties agreed that the Catholic Faith was enshrined in Holy Scripture and in the writings of the Catholic Fathers, and that the first step was to collect and arrange dogma. But at this point a difficulty arose. Abelard (1079-1141) demonstrated both in his Sic et Non and in his lectures in Paris that innumerable contradictions existed in the Catholic Fathers. The person therefore who undertook the task of collation must follow the weight of evidence. Peter Lombard (d. 1161) began this task by an examination of the works of Ambrose, Hilary, Augustine, Cassiodorus and Remigius, extracting from them, generally in the words of the writers, clear and definite statements of doctrine. These he arranged in his four Books of the Sentences, the first containing forty-eight distinctions on the Holy Trinity, foreknowledge, freedom, etc.; the second, forty-four on angels, demons, creation of man, modes and penalties of sin, etc.; the third, forty on the incarnation, redemption, virtues, etc.; the fourth, fifty on the Sacraments, offices of the Church, resurrection, the Last Judgment and eternity. The work met the pressing need of the day and became at once the accepted text-book of the schools. On it were based the copious lectures of Albertus Magnus (1193-1280) and the Summa Theologia of St. Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274). This vast work is by far the most important contribution to systematic theology of the scholastic period, and is still the accepted text-book of the Roman Catholic Church. In form it differs widely from the work of Peter Lombard. The first section deals with God, the second with man, and the third with the God-Man. The last portion was left incomplete at the death of the writer and was completed by his pupils. The entire work contains 512 questions, and about 2,500 articles. The authorities cited are incomparably more numerous than those dealt with by Lombard, and embrace heterodox as well as orthodox divines. Every known argument for or against every article is considered with unfailing impartiality, and the conclusion is drawn in precise and simple language by the most rigorous application of the dialectic of Aristotle.

The difference between the methods of Anselm and Thomas illustrates the difference between the synthetic and the analytical ways of thinking, a difference marked and profound.

3. Debt to Aristotle.

Anselm, like all other writers of his time, thought in the light of Plato, Thomas in that of Aristotle. In pre-scholastic ages the logical works of Aristotle had only been vaguely known through an abridgement of the Organon by Gregory of Nazianzus, the Abstract of Boethius, and the Isagoge of Porphyry. From the time of Pope Sylvester II (999) Latin translations derived from Arabic versions of ancient Greek authors began to find their way into Christian Europe, and amongst these the grammatical and logical works of Aristotle. Much time, however, elapsed before the Church could bring herself to employ the dialectical method of a heathen philosopher. Abelard incurred censure from the conservative theologians of his time for doing this. A scholar of the encyclopædic knowledge and vast influence of Albertus Magnus could afford to ignore objections of such a character, but it was not until the saintly Thomas Aquinas had showed how valuable an instrument the Church possessed in the dialectic of Aristotle that prejudice yielded to assent. From the appearance of the Summa the authority of Aristotle became supreme. From this time the synthetic, speculative methods of an earlier age passed away, and dialectical methods took their place.

The rise of Scholasticism coincided with and to a large extent occasioned the establishment of the great Universities of mediæval Europe.

4. Words and Things.

Latin being the universal language of literature, it was possible for students to pass from land to land and one centre of learning to another without inconvenience. The possession of a single literary language, however, tended to narrow the intellectual outlook, and to foster a notion prevalent at all times that mere words possess some mysterious quality, and carry with them a sort of guarantee of a thing in the background of which they are a mark. Submission to the tyranny of words is perhaps the most serious defect of the Schoolmen. From a misunderstanding of a passage in Porphyry cited by Boethius arose a remarkable controversy that divided the Schoolmen for centuries into hostile camps. In that passage Porphyry speaks of words or things, as if the two were convertible. This raised the question whether words really were things.

Now it is clear that, if all our thinking is in words, and words always are marks of things, the mind of man is ultimately a function of the world of matter. If, on the other hand, words are merely marks of ideas, the external world, for all we know, may be nothing but a function of mind. These two positions have in recent years been advocated by opposing schools. The modern Materialist, or, as he is popularly called, Realist, from his insistence on the reality of the external world, resolves mind into matter. On the other hand, the Idealist resolves matter into mind. The dispute lies in the mysterious region where mind and matter meet.

In the Middle Ages the same problem presented itself in a slightly different form. All agreed that some words were marks of things, but there were other words, called by Aristotle Universals, which were obviously not marks of things in the same direct way. Thus the word Humanity is not a mark of a number of individual men viewed in a crowd, but is either a mark of an abstract idea or of some observed common quality existing in men so regarded. According to Plato, these Universals had a connection with ideas in the Divine Mind, and this belief, transmitted through the Christian Neo-platonists of Alexandria, was widely diffused prior to the rise of Scholasticism.

With the advent of Aristotle a school of thinkers arose who maintained that there was no essential reality or substantia attaching to universal ideas either outside in the Mind of God or outside in the region of matter; that Universals in short were mere words, or marks of ideas not of things. From entertaining this view they were called Nominalists. Opposed to them were those who clung to pre-scholastic Platonism which regarded Universals as things having a counterpart in God, and a corresponding reality in the world of matter. So real in their view were these Universals, that they predicated of them substance and accident. But, as you may endlessly multiply Universals, you can endlessly multiply these visionary substances underlying them; and these Universals may have other Universals as their attributes, and so on for ever. Supporters of such doctrines were termed Realists. From this it will appear that the Realist of to-day is the Nominalist of an earlier age.

The point in dispute was in reality of great consequence to religion. If, the Realist urged, there is no substantia in an Universal, it follows that the virtues and the vices (which all agree are Universals) have no actual existence. They are only ways of thinking. And, if this is said of them, what hinders from saying the same of God, the highest of all Universals. To this the Nominalist replied that it is not necessary to assume that because a word is a Universal there is no entity corresponding with it. If it please God to reveal Himself to His Church, as He has done in Holy Scripture, a Nominalist has as good a ground for certainty through faith, as a Realist through Reason. Albertus and Aquinas, both Dominicans, were pure Realists; and Duns Scotus, the Franciscan, allied himself with the same party, though he preferred to base his belief in God and in the fundamental distinctions between right and wrong on revelation, in this preparing the way for his disciple, Ockam, a pure Nominalist. Both Duns and Ockam agreed that the basis of ethics lay in the will of God, not in the nature of things; but Ockam went much further, practically carrying religion out of the region of reason into that of faith. If, he said, God had revealed to man that it was His pleasure that man should hate Him, it would have been man's duty to do so.

The limits of this article will not permit a discussion of the metaphysics or philosophy of the Schoolmen. It must suffice therefore to say that many of the important problems that are still debated by philosophers have their roots in the discussions of these early thinkers. It will be necessary to point out however two common mistakes. Many people regard the Schoolmen as impractical dreamers, wrangling over airy abstractions with no relation to everyday affairs. Yet as a matter of fact all the prominent Schoolmen were actively engaged in the business of life. Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas were bishops of important dioceses. Duns Scotus, Hales, Ockam, Grosseteste and a crowd of lesser men spent laborious lives in the conduct of public affairs. Again, far from being fanciful dreamers, they distrusted imagination, and reduced their minds to logical machines. If their discussions appear speculative, it is because the matter on which they reason and which they derive from ancient authors is speculative. Given their premises, their conclusions inevitably follow. Unfortunately, the "critical faculty" was as yet undeveloped. Whatever came to their hand from an authority accepted as catholic they accepted. It never occurred to such a man as Duns Scotus that the Papal claims were based on forgeries, or to the Franciscan Friars, who devoted their lives to science, that many of the assertions of the ancients were utterly devoid of foundation. In the Middle Ages whatever was found in a book was found in Nature, a variant of the old error that words are always marks of things.

From the fact that the majority of the Schoolmen were actively engaged in public affairs, it inevitably followed, in an age of ecclesiastical corruption, that many of them also were ardent reformers. Ockam, for his attack on papal abuses, suffered imprisonment at Avignon. Wycliffe, another distinguished Schoolman, who opposed papal encroachments on national liberty and the abuses of the mendicant orders, was the object of relentless persecution. His repudiation of the then novel doctrine of Transubstantiation was based on scholastic principles. He could not conceive a group of accidents, round, white, etc., without a substantia to support them, and he had the courage to say so. But, if the substantia and accidents of bread remained, the bread remained; therefore Christ could not be present substantially, but sacramentally, a distinction he failed, however, to define. Finding another word, he assumed he had found another thing.

Like other great intellectual movements, Scholasticism passed through various stages, attaining its zenith in Aquinas, and from his time gradually falling into decrepitude, partly from the multiplication of minute

6. Decline of Scholasticism.

distinctions of merely verbal character and the internal decay of its methods and principles; partly from the growth of corruption in the Church, compelling men of serious purpose to turn their attention away to the more urgent task of reform; partly from the revival of classical learning, and the cultivation of the arts and poetry and those gifts of the imagination which the didactic habits of Scholasticism had so long suppressed. With the revival of classical Latin the jargon of the schools fell into disrepute, and with it the vast metaphysical and philosophical systems that had given it birth. In the hey-day of its glory Scholasticism had essayed to reduce all human learning to a systematic form under the ægis of Theology, the Queen of Sciences. In the day of its abasement men turned from it in weariness, blind to the work it had accomplished. That work however reasserted itself, and the permanent results of the movement may still be traced in theology, science, education and reform.

The systematic theology of the Schoolmen profoundly affected the political and social life of the people during the Middle Ages, and still forms the basis of modern theology. Bucer is said to have declared that but for Thomas he would soon have overthrown the Pope. There can be no doubt that the Roman Church resisted the disintegrating forces of the Reformation mainly by the impregnable front offered to her foes by the compact and complete theology formulated by the School Divines. The later doctrinal corruptions of Rome may likewise be traced back to such writers as Duns Scotus and his followers, who unknowingly did so much to rivet the chains of despotism on the mind. The Reformers, after purging out the unscriptural elements in current theology, took over its main body and adopted it for their own. That no attempt should have been made to supply a systematic theology to the Church of England is proof that none was deemed necessary. Calvin's Institutes, the only great work of the Reformation period, are based on scholastic divinity. While Fulke deemed it needful to defend the Church of England for her translation of the Bible, and Jewel and Hooker for her ecclesiastical polity, no writer in this country ventured to repeat the comprehensive redaction of Scripture and the Catholic Fathers which had been accomplished by such men as Lombard, Aquinas and Hales. The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England are steeped in Thomian Theology.

From the revival of scientific research by the early Franciscan Schoolmen the growth of applied sciences has been uninterrupted. The notion that modern science owes its beginning to Sir Francis Bacon is one of those singular delusions for which there is no warranty in fact. The Instauratio Magna had no effect on contemporary or subsequent science. That the advance previous to his time had been slow was due to other causes than the employment of the dialect of Aristotle. Roger Bacon was an inductive inquirer long before Sir Francis Bacon "invented" induction.

8. knowledge in the natural and (b) in Science.

Europe owes most of her universities to the Scholastic movement. In England those of Oxford and Cambridge, and in Scotland those of Glasgow, St. Andrew's and Aberdeen, were founded by Schoolmen, and for centuries retained the Schoolmen's methods. No country exhibits the inherent vitality of Scholasticism in a more remarkable way than Scotland, where the whole system of education both primary and in her universities was for hundreds of years conducted on the strictest scholastic lines. If the average North Briton to-day is clear-headed and logical, he owes these qualities to his schools. The rigorous logical training received by the early Reformers furnished them with a dialectical subtlety invaluable in the fierce controversies of their time.

9 (c) in

The leading Reformers, Luther, Calvin, Knox and Cranmer, were all educated in the principles of Scholasticism and in the scholastic theology. The peculiar doctrines that became characteristic marks of the reformed religious bodies had their roots in the ancient learning. The independence of National Churches, and of the Episcopate, were principles long discussed in the schools. Presbyterians found in the principles of scholastic theology a justification for their identification of bishop and priest. Even the doctrine so much favoured by the Puritans known as "Dominion founded in Grace" (and repudiated in Art. 26) was borrowed from scholastic divines. Taken as a whole, Scholasticism stood for the harmony of faith and reason. "Credo quia absurdum est," said Tertullian; "Credo ut intelligam," said Anselm; but the Schoolmen went further, asserting that nothing could be a matter of faith that was contrary to reason. That they failed to maintain this position was due to the ultra dogmatic subtlety of Duns Scotus and men of his type, who withdrew doctrine after doctrine from the region of rational faith into that of authority, thus breaking up that harmonious relationship between reason and faith which the earlier Schoolmen had laboured so zealously to establish. In spite of this failure, the history of theology, education, science and reform alike bear witness to the value of that intellectual movement which raised Europe from the depths of barbarism, and prepared the way for the renaissance of learning and the reformation of religion in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries.

SCHOOLS.—The history of Elementary Schools in our country dates from the religious revival in the reign of William III and from the foundation of the

1. Early History.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698), whose first object was the creation and support of S. in which children of the poorest class might receive sound religious and secular education. By the year 1741 nearly 2,000 Charity S. had been established in Great Britain and Ireland through the means of this Society.

In the beginning of the 19th cent. new vigour was infused into the cause of education by the systems of Bell and Lancaster, which won the approval of all interested in the movement. These systems were similar if not practically identical from the educational point of view, advocating the instruction of a large number of children by monitors under the supervision of one head teacher. They differed, however, from the religious point of view, Dr. Bell favouring instruction in the doctrines of the Ch. of England, while Mr. Lancaster preferred what has since been known as undenominational teaching.

2. Schools

So greatly did the work grow that it was thought desirable that a Society should be founded whose sole work would be to encourage and promote elementary education in connection with the Ch. of England. Therefore, in 1811, the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the principles of the Established Church was founded. The supporters of Mr. Lancaster's system founded about the same time the British and Foreign School Society.

So far all that had been done for the promotion of education had been carried out by private munificence. It was not until 1833 that the first grant was made out of public funds towards education. This grant of £20,000 was to be used exclusively for building purposes, and was divided equally between the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society. In 1839 the Committee of Council was formed to administer the Education Grant, which was raised to £30,000. From this time grants were gradually increased, and as a natural consequence the State exercised more control over education, until in 1862 the various minutes of the Committee of Council were collected by Mr. Lowe and formed into the Revised Code. He also introduced the system of payment by results, which was intended to form a stimulus to education, but after a long course in which it fostered worry, overstrain and undue pressure, it sank into a dishonoured grave.

The mind of the country was now thoroughly awakened to the importance of education, and its conscience was stirred by the fact that only one-third of the children in this land were being educated: S. only existed for one-half, and there was no power to compel attendance at school. Enormous efforts were made by the clergy of the Ch. of England at this time to increase the number of S., but it was becoming evident that the matter was passing beyond the power of voluntary resources, and that the State would have to take it in hand as a national duty. Thus in 1870 Mr. Forster introduced his bill, which was intended not to destroy the voluntary system but to fill up what was lacking and to build S. out of money provided by the rates, where such were needed. At the same time the Conscience Clause was introduced which enabled parents to withdraw their children from religious instruction or observances, if they wished. Another noteworthy clause was that proposed by Mr. Cowper-Temple, which forbade the use in Board S. of any catechism or formulary distinctive of any denomination.

The effect of this Act has been to promote the gradual increase of public S. built and supported, so far as required, out of the rates and the proportionate gradual decrease of voluntary S., which had to rely upon voluntary contributions, while Board S. could fall back upon the rates. Great and self-denying efforts have been made by Ch. people, especially by the clergy, to maintain the Ch. S., but the burden became intolerable. It was evident that, unless some further help could be given to Denominational S., it would be impossible to maintain them except in a few districts.

To relieve what was called "the intolerable strain" an Education Act was passed by Mr. Balfour in 1902. By this Act all education, primary, secondary, and technical, in a given area is placed under the control of one authority, which authority is a Committee of the County Council or Borough Council. The whole cost of the maintenance of education is undertaken by this authority, the managers of Voluntary S. providing the buildings and undertaking to keep them in repair and to carry out all reasonable alterations and improvements. The Education Authority appoints one-third of the Managers and has a veto on the appointment of teachers, so far as their educational efficiency is concerned. The religious teaching in Voluntary S. is under the control of the Managers.

2. The Present Situation.

This Act was confessedly a compromise. It was accepted by the Ch. as offering terms as favourable as she was likely to get, but it can hardly be said that it was received with enthusiasm. The majority of the Nonconformists opposed it, because they considered that it quartered denominational S. on the rates. It led to the "passive resistance" movement, the adherents of which refused to pay such part of their rates as was levied for education. There is no doubt that the Act produced a certain amount of friction on both sides at first, but at the present time it is working more smoothly and on the whole satisfactorily.

To meet the alleged grievances of the Nonconformists three Bills were successively introduced by three Liberal ministers of Education, Mr. Birrell, Mr. McKenna and Mr. Runciman, but all three were strongly opposed by Ch. people and failed to become law. Various plans have been proposed to effect a permanent and equitable settlement. A body called the Education Settlement Committee, comprising representatives of various denominations, has put forth a carefully considered scheme which has met with some measure of support. Another scheme which finds favour with the majority of Ch. people has been set forth under the name of Lord Salisbury's Plan. The present Government is pledged to legislate in accordance with the views of the Nonconformist party.

It is impossible to say what may happen in the near future, but for every reason it is to be hoped that a permanent settlement, just and equitable to all, may be reached. -K6.

SCOTLAND, PB HISTORY IN.—The first Reformed service-book used in Scotland was the Second PB of Edward VI (1552). In

1557 the leading Reformers decreed its use in the Parish Kirks. At first it could only have been used within the districts where the Reforming leaders held sway, and it was superseded after a few years by Knox's Book of Common Order, often called the Order of Geneva. This was originally compiled by Knox and others for the use of the Eng. Congregation in Geneva, and a new edition was published for Scotland in 1562. As a liturgy it had little merit, being more a directory than a service-book. Forms were provided for ordinary services, the administration of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and Marriage, with a prayer for the Visitation of the Sick. The minister was, however, not bound to use the words of the book, but might substitute his own if he thought well. No service was permitted at the Burial of the dead, nor was Ordination by the laying on of hands continued. The Church's round of fast and festival, too, was ignored. No wonder that Knox's book did not for any length of time keep its position, within less than a century passing into disuse.

The dissatisfaction with the Genevan book soon began to show itself in various attempts to revise the liturgy. Even in the time of Presbyterian ascendancy, as early as 1601, proposals were made to revise and amend the prayers contained in it. Nothing came of this movement, but in 1616, after the restoration of a true Episcopacy, the General Assembly decreed "that a liturgy be made, and a form of divine service, which shall be read in every Ch., in common prayer." A committee of four ministers prepared a Book of Common Prayer, the manuscript of which was not published till modern times, and is now preserved in the British Museum.

The foregoing will make it clear that, up to the appearance in 1637 of the so-called PB of

1. The 1637 Book. Laud, there was no objection felt in Scotland to a liturgy as such, but on the contrary that there was a growing desire for a better one than the Book of Common Order provided. The beautiful but ill-fated liturgy of 1637 has suffered from many misrepresentations. It is still known as Laud's book, whereas it was mainly the work of Scottish Bps., particularly Maxwell Bp. of Ross, and Wedderburn Bp. of Dunblane. Both Charles I and Laud had wished to have the English PB introduced, but deferred to the opinion of the Scottish Bps., that a purely Scottish book would be more acceptable to the nation. Charles and Laud revised the draft and made various suggestions, but the book as a whole was a Scottish production. It was abused as Popish and declared to be a revision of the Missal, merely in order to stir up popular passion. And even the idea that it was the prime cause of the revolt of the nation is erroneous. The unwise and unconstitutional method of its introduction was indeed the spark that lit the flame, but the real trouble was the Act of Revocation, which threatened the nobles who possessed Ch. lands with the loss of the Reformation spoils. The riot in St. Giles's Church at the first reading of the new liturgy, popularly associated with the mythical Jenny Geddes, was in all likelihood carefully organised by those who had so much to lose.

Among the features of the book were a re-translation of the Ath. Creed, the changed order of prayers in HC (based upon the 1549 PB), the shortened words of administration, the adoption of the AV, the use of the word Presbyter for priest, and the re-introduction of the Epiclesis, or Invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the elements of bread and wine.

Although this PB immediately fell into disuse, its merits were afterwards recognised in two directions. Firstly, at the 1662 revision of the English PB it was consulted, and several of its suggestions adopted; and, secondly, it was the source of the SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE. For, after the disestablishment of the Ch. in 1689, the use of whole or part of the Communion Service in the 1637 PB began, and "wee bookies" containing it were published. As time went on, several important variations were introduced, until the present form of 1764 was arrived at.

The troubles that began in 1637 had for one result a violent reaction against all liturgical worship, and not even when

4. Later History.

Episcopacy was re-established in 1661 was a Prayer Book introduced again, the Ch. services being of the barest possible description. After the Revolution, in the time of Queen Anne, the English PB began to be used by the Episcopalians, a use which has continued to the present day. By the canons of the Scottish Ch. certain variations are permitted, apart from the use of the Scottish Communion Office. Thus the words, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," and "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord, for this Thy glorious Gospel," are enjoined to be used before and after the Gospel; the Bp. in the Act of Confirm. may use the words of the 1549 PB in addition to the present form; certain omissions may be made in the addresses of the Marriage service; and in the Burial service another lesson may be substituted with the Bp's. sanction, and certain prs. added.

Finally, it may be mentioned that a complete revision both of the PB and of the Scottish Office has just been completed,

SCOTTISH CHURCH.—The Scottish sister of the Ch. of Eng., officially called The Episcopal

1. Present Position. Ch. in Scotland, is numerically a small body, claiming only three per cent. of the population. Yet her place in Scottish history, her social influence, and her position as a branch of the Ang. Communion, give her an importance in Scotland out of proportion to her numbers. Popularly known as the "English Church," and using though she does the Eng. PB, her roots are imbedded in the national history, and she forms a distinct and independent province of the Ch. The thirteen Pre-Reformation dioceses have been re-grouped into seven, and the seven bishops elect one of their number to be Primus. The Primus holds office for life or until resignation, and acts as president of the College of Bishops.

Ch. finance is in the hands of a mixed body of clergy and lay-representatives called the Representative Ch. Council, and legislation is enacted by the Provincial Synod, an entirely clerical body, which meets only when summoned by the Bps. An important step in the development of the powers of the laity was taken in 1905, when the Consultative Council on Ch. legislation, composed of clerical and lay members, was appointed to discuss all legislation proposed to be dealt with by the Provincial Synod. The English PB is the authorised Service-Book of the Ch., certain variations from its use being canonically sanctioned. The Scottish Communion Office is used only in a proportion of the congregations, and until recently the canons placed it in a position of inferiority to the PB office. The Thirty-nine Articles are appointed for subscription by the clergy.

The history can only be indicated in briefest outline. (1) The Romano-British Ch. Christianity penetrated northwards during the Roman occupation 80-410 A.D. Little is known of St. Ninian (397 A.D.), the Ap. of the Picts, who laboured in Wigtonshire, and founded the Ch. of Candida Casa at Whitburn. Of other missionaries like Palladius and Serf, we know little more than their names. St. Mungo, the patron saint of Glasgow, laboured in Strathclyde.

2. Early History.

St. Patrick, the Irish Ap., cannot with certainty be claimed as a Scotsman.

(2) The Celtic Ch. A new stream of Christian influence, which left an indelible mark on Scotland, came from Ireland in 563, when St. Columba landed with 12 companions at Iona, and made that famous island the centre of Christian life for a great part of the country. Celtic Christianity was tribal, and had many peculiarities, one of which was the position of the Bp., who was subject to the Abbat in jurisdiction. The Culdees were hermits whose system developed out of the Columban organisation.

(3) The Mediæval Ch. By the 11th century the Celtic Ch. had fallen into decay, and revival came through St. Margaret, the English wife of Malcolm Canmore. She laid the foundation of that connection with Rome which resulted in the subjection of the Scottish Ch. to the Papacy.

(4) The Reformation. The general corruption of the Mediæval Ch. was intensified in Scotland, and when the crash came (1560) the ruin was much greater than in England.

3. The Reformation.

The primitive church organisation was swept away under the influence of John Knox, and various unsuccessful attempts were made to supply its place. Superintendents, and after them un consecrated Bps. (the Tulchans), were tried, until Presbyterianism was established in 1592 through the efforts of Andrew Melville.

(5) Episcopacy. In 1610 a true Episcopacy was restored in the persons of Spottiswoode, Hamilton and Lamb. The unwise interference of James VI and Charles I, however, gradually brought about its fall, and the riot in St. Giles over the so-called PB of Laud opened the way to the re-establishment of Presbyterianism, the Civil War and the Commonwealth. With the return of Charles II the line of Bps. was restored, but with unhappy results. The murder of Abp. Sharp and the repression of the Covenanters left results which are still felt to-day.

6. The Disestablished Ch. With the accession of William of Orange came the triumph of Presbyterianism. In 1689 the Episcopal

4. Later Days. Ch., although claiming more than half of the people of Scotland, was disestablished and disendowed for her adhesion to Jacobite principles. Disaster followed disaster, and the Jacobite risings of 1715 and 1745 were followed by repressive penal laws which reduced the Ch. to "the shadow of a shade." Gradually, however, better times dawned. The Penal Laws were repealed in 1792, and all disabilities were finally removed in 1864. Since then the Ch.'s history has been one of growth and progress, which still continues, and points to a great part which she is yet to play in the national life.—A1. A. MITCHELL.

SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE.—The Scottish PB of 1637 was drawn up by some

1. Its Genesis.

Scottish Bps. at the instigation of Charles I, and revised by Abp. Laud. Laud desired the adoption of the English PB, but the Scottish Bps. were of a different mind (see Laud's defence at his trial). A special feature of this PB is the express Invocation of the Holy Ghost upon the elements in HC (see EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION, § 12).

Neither the Scottish nor the English PB was restored in Scotland at the restoration of Episcopacy in 1661, the service for a time being much after Presbyterian models. But in Queen Anne's reign the use of the English PB was revived in the disestablished Ch., owing chiefly, it is said, to free grants of PBs from Oxford. It was also furthered by a desire to secure the support of the powerful English Ch., while poverty and politics combined to prevent the reprinting of the Communion Office from the Scottish PB. At length in 1724 Bp. Gadderar, of Aberdeen, reprinted it; and in 1731 the Scottish Bps. gave their formal recognition to it as well as to the English Liturgy. The absence, however, of any official text complicated the issues, and various reprints followed, with divergent texts, until in 1764 there appeared the book which has since become the recognised Scottish Communion Office.

The main feature of this Office is the sequence of its different parts. The confusions of our existing Eng. rite are avoided, and the Recital of Institution, the Oblation, the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, the Prayer for the Ch. on earth and Commemoration of the faithful departed, and the Lord's Prayer, follow each other in due order in accordance with the early Liturgies.

The value of the SCO. became increasingly appreciated. In 1806 Bp. Horsley, of St. David's, wrote the often-quoted letter in which he said: "With respect to the comparative merit of the two Offices for England and Scotland, I have no scruple in declaring to you . . . that I think the Scotch Office more conformable to the primitive models, and in my private judgment more edifying than that which we now use; inasmuch that were I at liberty to follow my own private judgment I would myself use the Scotch Office in preference" (Dowden, ASCO., p. 106).

In a Synod at Aberdeen in 1811 a canon was passed giving liberty "to retain the English

2. Its History.

Office in all congregations where the said Office had been previously in use," but enacting that "the SCO. shall be used in all consecrations of Bps.; and that every Bp., when consecrated, shall give his full assent to it as being sound in itself, and of primary authority in Scotland." This very definite elevation of the SCO. was, however, weakened in 1828. And in 1863 a new Code of canons was enacted in which permission was given to retain the SCO. in congregations in which it was already in use, but at all consecrations, etc., the English Office was to be used, and likewise in all new congregations, unless a majority of applicants to the Bp. desired the use of the SCO. (canon 30). Thus, says Bp. Dowden, the Synod of 1862-3 "dishonoured and degraded" the SCO. (Dowden, p. 21). The reason for doing so was political. The Scottish Ch. was seeking escape for its priests from the legal disabilities to which Scottish ordination subjected them. Their efforts were opposed by Eng. Protestants on the ground that the SCO. constituted a vital difference between the Chs. of Scotland and England. To satisfy this challenge the Scottish clergy were ready to sacrifice their own invaluable Office, and substitute for it the Communion Office of the Eng. Church. [See also SCOTLAND, PB HISTORY IN.]

The Scottish PB of 1637 will be found reprinted in Hall's Reliquiae Liturgicae, vol. 2 (1847), and its Communion Office in Dowden's Anno- were, in the Latin Churches, generally suspended from the four posts of the altar canopy. But another arrangement was used by Eastern Christians, namely a beam across the sanctuary. Such beams, when of any considerable length, were necessarily supported by columns and thus formed rudimentary Ss., the originals of the modern Greek "Iconostasis" and the Teutonic rood S. In Italy, rood Ss. are rare, except in Venice and the neighbouring cities. The Greek Church has preserved the ancient custom of completely screening the altar and sanctuary, whereas Western Europe has evolved the familiar form of rood S., and has transferred its position from the sanctuary to the chancel entrance. Owing to Jesuit influence the Roman Church has quite abandoned the use of rood Ss. The English Church alone has continued their use, although a Philistine generation has destroyed many fine examples. Here too the custom of dividing off the sanctuary from the quire survived in the mediæval use of the Lenten veil, in the wooden sanctuary S. at St. David's, and in the frequent occurrence of an eastern transept in our larger churches, forming a prominent architectural line of demarcation east of the stalls.

Monastic and cathedral Ss. are primarily intended to separate the quire from the church,

2. Monastic and Cathedral Screens.

whereas parochial Ss. are mere barriers across a building intended to be used as a whole. Hence the former are generally solid structures, and the latter are of open work. In many abbey churches the naves served as parish churches distinct from the quires of the Religious. In such cases the S. was double. In front of the western wall stood the parish altar, between two doorways. The Eastern wall had a single central doorway, and the loft over was termed the Pulpitum. This arrangement can still be seen at St. Albans, and the western halves of similar Pulpita remain at Croyland, Malmesbury and Wymondham. Such pulpita once existed at Durham and Canterbury, but both these have given way to more modern arrangements.

In the secular cathedrals the quire Ss. were solid thick walls as at York or double as at Exeter, but in England the doorways were always central, and the S. was always broad enough to carry a roomy loft. At Exeter, altars were placed each side of the central doorway; at St. David's, there is an altar on the north side only.

German cathedral Ss. usually have two doorways and a central people's altar, at the back of which, in the quire, is the bishop's throne, facing eastwards. In Spanish churches the quire stalls are generally westwards of the transept and the quire S. has no doors at all, the sanctuary being closed with metal grilles and connected with the quire by a railed-in passage. But in late Spanish churches the quire is banished to the western gallery, and only the metal sanctuary S. is retained.

From the roodlofts of our cathedrals and the pulpita of our abbeys the Gospel was intoned at solemn services. Perhaps also sermons were preached in this place. Here stood the organs, and here was the chief ornament of a mediæval interior, the great Calvary group. At Wells the sockets for the rood and attendant images may be seen above the arch built in the 14th cent. to strengthen the central tower, while the S. stands under the eastern tower arch.

Parochial Ss. differ considerably from the quire Ss. and pulpita of cathedrals and abbeys.

3. Parish Church Screens.

Their material is generally, though not always, timber. Then they are usually of open work, at any rate after Norman times. Our narrow Norman chancel arches are practically mere doorways in solid S. walls. Sometimes, as at Hadleigh (Essex), Curdworth (Warwickshire), and Winchfield (Hants.), squint holes were cut through these S. walls in the 13th and subsequent cents. on each side of the old Norman arches.

Our oldest timber chancel S. is the 13th cent. example at Stanton Harcourt, that at Northfleet being rather later. Both consist of a row of wooden arches carried on turned posts. The Ss. in King's Lynn Church and Chichester Hospital are 14th cent. woodwork.

Turning to stone chancel Ss., a few 13th cent. examples exist of triple chancel arches, and at Stebbing and Great Bardfield (Essex) the wide chancel arches are filled in with stone tracery like immense unglazed windows. The finest of our stone chancel Ss. is, however, that at Totnes (Devon), a rich composition of open tracery panels elaborately moulded and carved, extending across both the nave and the aisles, as is often the case with West Country Screens.

But the great majority of English chancel Ss. are of late date and constructed of oak. These usually carried roodlofts and sometimes also a solid partition shutting off the chancel and forming a background to the great rood. A good example of such a tympanum was barbarously removed during a recent "Restoration" at Wenham Church (Suffolk). Parish roodlofts were probably used as music galleries, but not for ceremonial purposes such as the singing of the Gospel.

In most of the East Anglian Ss. ranges of tall narrow arches carry comparatively narrow-vaulted lofts, and the lower panels contain excellent paintings of saints, the framework being elaborately painted and gilt. Such are the Ss. at Trunch and Southwold.

The typical West-country Ss., Bovey and Dartmouth for example, are comparatively low, with wide arches filled with mullions and tracery, broad-vaulted galleries, and richly carved cornices of vine work. They are generally painted without figure panels.

Modifications of these two leading types are found in other districts, but many simple Ss. exist with plain rectilinear framework, traceried heads to the open panels, and simple coved lofts above, as at Handborough (Oxfordshire).

The quire screen at King's College is refined Renaissance work, and the chancel Ss. at Croscombe and St. John's Leeds, in Wren's churches of St.

7. Post-Reformation Screens. Margaret's Lothbury and St. Peter's Cornhill, and the 18th cent. screen-work at Crwys Morchard deserve attention as prominent Post-Reformation examples. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

SCRIPTURE.—Under AUTHORITY, §§9-16, will be found sketched a conception of the genesis and permanent value of Holy S. which it is hoped will be found valid by adherents of more than one school of biblical criticism. Further contributions to the general subject are grouped in App. B5 (cp. also DOCTRINE, HISTORY, KNOWLEDGE, STUDY, TRUTH). The present art. is therefore strictly supplementary.

In the time of our Lord the Jews had already become "the people of the book," the term by which they are known in the Koran. And already the risk had arisen that reverence would degenerate into superstition, and that, by a slavish literalism, out of an instrument of spiritual emancipation might be forged fetters to cramp the submissive, and bars to exclude the free.

In the attitude of our Lord towards the OT we have a perfect pattern of reverent regard for the venerated forms in which the revealing Spirit's past influence and teaching had come to be enshrined, together with an unfettered readiness to follow the leading of that Spirit in the living present. In the writers of the NT we find this attitude generally reflected, though perhaps the balance is not always held quite evenly. At least there are not a few OT allusions to which it is difficult to ascribe more than a literary and illustrative force, but which seem to be intended to carry argumentative weight. The early Ch. took over the Greek OT without much inquiry, and in course of time added to it the NT. The whole came to be regarded more and more as a sacred canon, the norm of truth, the fountain of authority, and the storehouse of the words of life. Reverence for the whole, together with the influence of Jewish example and tradition, soon led to veneration of the parts, and only the invention of the allegorical method saved the doctrine of S. from breaking down. But in due course the living authority of the interpreting Ch., which had all along been a force operative to prevent extreme inferences, gained in weight and volume, and the sense of S. was settled within certain limits. The SCHOOLMEN assumed the main outline of the doctrinal and institutional system of the Ch. to be scriptural, and spent their strength in articulating and extending the dogmatic structure, accommodating refractory data as best they could.

The Continental Reformation was in form an appeal to the authority of S. against the usurped authority of the mediæval Ch. over the mind and conscience of the individual. But the Bible was only called in to remedy those points in the mediæval system which pressed hardly upon the reformers. No attempt was made at a general reconstruction of Christian doctrine, nor was any fresh and systematic investigation made as to the nature of the Bible and its claims to authority. Erasmus remained in communion with Rome, and merely shifted the emphasis from doctrine to morality. Luther criticised Bible and Ch. where his favourite doctrines of the universal priesthood of believers and justification by faith were concerned, but otherwise was even more conservative than Erasmus. Calvin showed good sense as an expositor where his doctrinal and institutional system was not involved, but it was from Geneva that the Puritans derived that view of the scriptural prescription of the presbyterian discipline which wrought such havoc with the religion of England. In the Eng. Ch., however, the essentially practical nature of the causes of change, and the ebbings and flowings of the tide of reform, co-operated with the national temper and the character of the leaders to ensure a certain balance of attitude which was a safeguard against exaggerations [See CHRISTIAN RELIGION, esp. § 21 (4).]

The Post-Reformation stringency of inspirational doctrine never received any sanction in the PB or other Ang. formularies,¹ but it rooted itself in Eng. theology, and led to a wrong place being given to the Bible in the construction of Christian doctrine. Two clearly marked stages were established: (1) the proof that the Bible was a revelation from God; (2) the unquestioning acceptance of everything that the Bible laid down. Each stage was artificial and one-sided. The Bible was taken as a homogeneous book, not historically as a Divine Library. A single rhetorical phrase (πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος) was read as a logical definition; this undetermined quality was assumed to be inerrancy; inspiration was denied to all writings outside the canon; the range of it was extended to the whole canonical literature accepted on the strength of Ch. tradition; and no room was left for degrees of it. The second stage noted above really preceded the first in time, which became prominent only when doubt was in the 18th cent. (or a little before) thrown on the Bible as being a Divine revelation of this kind.

The ultra-orthodox line of defence may be represented by a quotation from Wm. Law's reply in 1731 to Tindal's Christianity as Old as Creation: "I appeal . . . to the miracles and prophecies on which Christianity is founded, as a sufficient proof that it is a Divine revelation. . . . Miracles sufficiently plain and evident . . . are the last resort; they determine for themselves, and cannot be tried by anything further. . . . A course of plain undeniable miracles attesting the truth of a revelation is the highest and utmost evidence of its coming from God, and not to be tried by our judgments about the reasonableness or necessity of its doctrines." But after being "twenty years in this dust of debate" he testifies that he has "always found that the more books there were written in this way of defending the Gospel, the more (he) was furnished with new objections to it." Having now become a mystic, he takes new ground in his Way to Divine Knowledge. "Gospel Christianity . . . stood upon its own true ground; it appeared to be what it was. And what was it? Why, it was an awakened Divine Life set up amongst men; itself was its own proof; it appealed to its proper judge, to the heart and conscience of man." "Every other thing, besides the Life and Light of God, stands only in a state of ministerial service to you; whether it be the words of a message from God written on paper, engraven on tables of stone, or spoken by the mouth of an angel, a prophet or apostles, and its creaturely service can rise no higher . . . than to show the true way to Him who only Himself can be the truth, the life, and the light in you."

No doubt the swing of the pendulum took Law to an untenable disparagement of the function of the mind. But at least he discerned the one ingredient in the varied contents of S. which is indispensable for certitude, what divines have called the testimonium internum Spiritus Sancti. It is true that we have in S. our best and surest means of knowing God; but any real knowledge of Him comes from S., not when merely taken by itself as a body of trustworthy information, but as it is freshly brought home to the soul by the revealing Spirit. In a word, God cannot be made to depend upon S., but S., both as written and as read, must rest upon the living God.

It has been pointed out that such a view as this underlies Ord.² The deacon, proceeding to priest's orders, is asked, "Are you determined . . . to teach nothing . . . but that which you shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved by the Scripture?" "The individual priest is to exercise his own personal judgment in the interpretation of Holy Scripture. It is furthermore clear that in this part of his office he is allowed very considerable latitude, for he is directed to assure himself, by diligent study,¹ of the truth of what he teaches; there must be no stereotyped teaching where persuasion and conviction do not follow upon study" (Confessions of a Clergyman, 1911).

The 19th cent. was a period of unrivalled activity in biblical criticism. It began in Germany, and reached often very extreme conclusions both there and in Holland. It spread to Anglo-Saxon Christendom, and finally, through the Modernist movement, has profoundly affected the Roman Ch. It is an error to regard its methods as viciously subjective. The most conservative scholar can no more avoid subjective criticism than he can stand on other feet than his own. The objective facts on which it is based are mainly biblical data, but they have been handled differently. Facts have been weighed as well as counted. Obscure or incongruous statements or allusions have been given due consideration. Indications of date have been noted. Marks of composite authorship have been patiently tracked out. In some circles sceptical presuppositions have warped the conclusions, but this cannot be said of English scholars in general, who have for the most part showed sobriety of judgment. The criterion has been, that the view which best accounts for all the facts should be accepted. With something like unanimity the teachers of the OT in the universities and principal colleges, and the editors of dictionaries and encyclopædias, have readjusted their attitude to the Bible, and the younger generation of clergy and educated laity are being taught on the new lines. But the bulk of the people and a large proportion of the clergy professedly hold fast in the main to the older view, and a situation is thus created which will present practical difficulties for some time.

The Ch. of Eng. ought to be in a peculiarly favourable position for effecting a gradual reconciliation. She is not committed, as we have seen, to any hard and fast doctrine of inspiration, but she unhesitatingly ascribes supreme authority to S. Any attitude towards the Bible which includes a genuine and effective recognition of the authority, if not of isolated texts, at least of the clearly recorded teaching of our Lord, and the consentient witness of the NT, and of the OT where it is not qualified by the NT, is consistent with loyalty to the Ch. And the practical grading of the contents of S., which is involved in their more or less frequent and prominent use¹ in the PB, makes it easier to tolerate a view which admits real distinctions of value. Cp. Sanday's Bampton Lectures on Inspiration; Ladd's Doctrine of Sacred S. (full and fair);

1. In Saxon ways, stalls, misericords, effigies, canopies, sedilia, piscinæ, gargoyles, testify to his skill, and proclaim symbolical truths or curious legends. His first efforts were the preaching or churchyard crosses which are often older than the churches. The early Saxon missionaries, St. Wilfrid, St. Paulinus and others, took with them on their journeys cutters of stone, who carved crosses.

A characteristic of these early Ss. is the curious interlacing scroll-work consisting of knotted and interlaced cords, and at Bewcastle, Ruthwell, Gosforth and other places the surface is carved with rude figures representing scenes from the Saviour's life sometimes blended with Norse legends of Heimdal, Loki and Hel. Two angels appear in the Saxon church at Bradford-on-Avon. Evidences exist of four main schools of the art of the period—the Celtic, Saxon, Roman or Byzantine, and Scandinavian. The reliefs in Chichester Cathedral are remarkable examples of the Byzantine style. Many Saxon churches were of wood; hence S. was not common.

But in the Norman period it was extensively used, and found abundant expression in the tympana and fonts. In many instances the subjects are rudely represented, and the carving of inferior workmanship, but they express many truths, and were doubtless intended to produce a devout frame of mind in the heart of the worshipper on entering church.

Thus the sculptural beak-heads represent the bird of the air in the Parable of the Sower ready to take away the Word from the careless receiver. A cross, tree (= the Tree of Knowledge), Agnus Dei, our Lord in Majesty, the Descent into Hell, St. Michael, animals, dragons, are some of the subjects carved.¹ Fonts, too, were carved with S.² Great advance was made in the sculptor's art in the 12th cent., and, though some foreign influence was felt, a new school of English art was speedily formed, which differed much from French fashion.

Good progress was made in the 13th and 14th cents., especially under the patronage of Henry III., and in the carving of effigies English sculptors showed great skill.

The best example is the figure of Henry III in Westminster fashioned by William Torell, and also that of Queen Eleanor. Westminster Abbey shows a very complete collection of English mediæval S. from the 13th to the 16th cent. The artists used not only stone, but wood, bronze,³ alabaster, silver, etc. The magnificent west fronts of large churches, of which Wells supplies the best example, afforded scope for the Gothic sculptor, and a wonderful art is manifested in the carving of choir stalls and misericords, from which we gather impressions of the daily life of the people, the limitations of their Bible knowledge, their legends of Saints, their censures on vice, and their opinions on monks and friars, as well as wonderful carvings of leaf and bloom. Grotesque carvings often appear in gargoyles, capitals, etc. The imagination of the mediæval sculptor represented sin in most hideous form. Fearful demons tormented lost souls, or were expelled from the sanctuary by the prayers of the faithful. The Church loved to dwell on the wrath of God; the sculptor could only follow. Sometimes he exercised his art in playful satire on the hypocrisies and vices of the age, on the contest of regulars and seculars, and he always told his story clearly. His sincerity and the wonderful fertility of his imagination are entitled to praise.

S. declined with other arts aft. the Reformation. The cents. that intervened between the end of the Tudors and the middle

4. After the Reformation. of the reign of George III produced little save memorial monuments, many of which are fine examples of Renaissance design and ornament, though the figure-work is usually the least successful part (see MONUMENTS).

There is nothing to note save the still-life carvings of Grinling Gibbons and the tombs by Nicholas Stone in Westminster. Flaxman's art revived the reputation of English S. It approached in spirit that of Greece, and several of his works adorn our cathedrals and large churches. The name of Chantry (1782-1841) must be mentioned, who produced many sepulchral monuments which are much admired in spite of their limited merits. It is unnecessary to record the labours of modern men. Much ancient work has perished and been destroyed, but enough remains to testify to the skill of English sculptors, who with force and feeling portrayed the faith as they had received it.—R1.

SEA, FORMS OF PRAYER TO BE USED AT.

—These were composed, it is said, though without certain authority, by Bp.

1. History. Sanderson, in 1661. After being examined and revised by Stern, Bp. of Carlisle, they were inserted in the revised PB of 1662. They are specially mentioned in the Pref. as one of the additions which it was thought advisable to make. Nothing further is known of their origin. The only parallel to them, according to Blunt, to be found in the ancient Services is a Missa pro Navigantibus, of which, however, no use has apparently been made.

We owe to the Long Parliament the first introduction of any special prayers to be used at sea. This is of interest, as marking perhaps the fuller organisation and greater importance of the Navy at this period. With the DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP (1643), intended to supersede the PB, was issued a supplement entitled "A Supply of Prayer for the Ships that want ministers to pray with them." In a preface to this it is stated that "The Common Prayer is still used on board ship, though elsewhere for many weighty reasons abolished; and to prevent the necessity of using it any longer, it hath been thought fit to frame some prayers agreeing with the Directory established by Parliament." That state of things was not, however, to last long, and with the restoration and revision of the PB in 1662 the regular "Forms of Prayer to be used at Sea," as we have them to-day, first appear. Under the Commonwealth the Navy had greatly increased in size through the regular levy of ship money, and also in honour and prestige through the great victories of Blake and Monk in the Dutch wars. It is doubtless due to these facts that Special Prayers for the Naval Service were felt to be desirable.

The Prayers, as may readily be seen, are, with the exception of the first two, only intended for occasional use and

2. Structure and Composition. are framed in strict accordance with the principles of the Ch. of England.

Few comments seem necessary. The first Coll., a very noble and comprehensive pr., is appointed to be used daily on board His Majesty's ships. It would be hard to conceive a better, both as regards its language and the manly and devout spirit that it breathes, though now there seems to be a need for one slight alteration in the wording, i.e., the word "Empire" for "Island."

The three following prs. contain quotations and allusions from various parts of Scripture, chiefly the Pss. (107 25, 89 10, 94, 80 2); also the cry of Hezekiah (Is. 38 19); and in the pr. to be said before a battle, Eccles. 9 11 and 1 Sam. 14 6.

It is noticeable that the prs. for use in war time lay stress on God's justice as well as His power, and, only in the hope that ours is a righteous cause, ask Him to defend, save and fight for us in spite of our personal sins, "for His Name's sake."

The Conf. and Absol. in the Service "when there shall be imminent danger" are taken from the HC. They are intended to be a very direct support, and to come with deep reality to men at that solemn time, when they may at any moment pass into eternity.

The Services of Thanksgiving presuppose a time of peace and quietness and also a choral use of the Church's Services. Very beautiful and suitable Pss. (66 and 107) are chosen to express fervent thankfulness to God for His mercies and deliverance. The special "Hymn of Praise" at the end is made up of passages from many Pss., slightly altered in a few cases to suit the occasion. The Coll. of Thanksgiving points us in noble language and sentiment to what should be the true object and result of victory, the good of all mankind and the advancement of God's glory upon earth.

In the Service for the Burial of the Dead there is one noticeable alteration from the older Form, i.e., the words "looking for the resurrection of the body, and the life of the world to come" for "in sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life." The reason for this change is not very clear. The alteration must have been intentional, and was perhaps made to avoid what might seem a too confident expression of hope. It is interesting to note that this altered Form has been adopted in the Amer. PB.

The first of the "Articles of War" reads as follows: "Officers are to cause Public Worship, according to the Liturgy of the

2. Use in the Navy. Ch. of Eng., to be solemnly performed in their ships, and take care that prayers and preaching by the Chaplains be performed diligently, and that the Lord's Day be observed." This is regularly carried out, though as a rule on board ship on Sundays the Services for MP and EP are used as in ordinary Church Worship, and the only prs. used constantly from this special Form are the first two Colls. These are in general use not only on Sundays, but at the daily "Morning Prayers" which are held in every battleship immediately after "Divisions" at 9 o'clock, when the crew are mustered on the quarter-deck and told off to their duties for the day.

After the battle of Trafalgar, when, at Nelson's death, the command of the British Fleet had passed to Collingwood, he at once ordered a solemn Service of Thanksgiving for the great victory, and also of "humiliation for our sins" to be held in all the vessels of the Fleet; and it is safe to assume that on that most memorable occasion these Forms of Prayer were used. This and like occasions of use lend to them a peculiar interest. That they are not in general use in the Navy is, of course, to be understood from the fact that they are in the main drawn up with a view to such special occasions of stress and emergency. Whenever such occasions may arise, these Prs. will assuredly prove most valuable and helpful in directing the hearts of our sailors to look for help and protection to the God of Battles, "Who hath measured the Waters in the hollow of His hand."—st. F. S. HORAN.

SEAMEN.—From early times the Church of England has recognised her duty towards S.

In 1300, when Edward I called out a fleet of thirty ships, chaplains were appointed "to confess the sailors." Under Henry VIII priests were attached to the admiral's retinue and rated as A.Bs. in the King's Army at sea. In the days of the Armada chaplains of ships had, besides S.'s pay, a groat a month contributed voluntarily from the wages of every man on board. At this time, and through the later days of the Reformation, there was much preaching of a Puritan type, and also Celebration of the HC at sea. In the days of Charles II, when Lord Dartmouth commanded the Tangier Expedition, he took pains to secure such men as Dr. Ken to go with him as chaplains. Not much appears to have been done in the 18th century.

In 1812 the Government took alarm at the ungodly condition of the Fleet, and tried to

2. In the Fleet. obtain a suitable number of chaplains. The official rank was given them, and a regular scale of pay adopted. There is now a Chaplain of the Fleet; each of the larger ships carries a chaplain, who, by the King's regulations, "is to be treated with the respect due to his sacred office, and not to be required to perform any executive duties, so that nothing may interfere with his being regarded as a friend and adviser by all on board." Prs. are held on the quarter-deck of every ship in H.M. Navy every day, whether she carries a chaplain or not. In ships carrying chaplains there is regular celebration of the HC. The Naval Church Society does valuable work in promoting fellowship and the formation of Church Institutes at home and abroad; and The Royal Naval Scripture Readers' Society employs agents to visit ships not carrying chaplains, and supplements the work of chaplains in R.N. barracks and dockyards. Although the character of Miss Agnes Weston's work is interdenominational, she herself is a Church-woman, and was trained in parochial activities for her life of wide influence. Her successful temperance work, provision of Sailors' Rests, enlistment of sympathy for S. and their families, good advice given through such publications as Ashore and Afloat, have been of incalculable service to the Church and Nation.

As regards the Merchant Service it must be borne in mind that up to the 19th cent. there was not that sharp line of demarcation between it and the Royal Navy that we see now. It was customary for the great merchant adventurers of Queen Elizabeth's time to gather their crews together daily for worship (cp. Articles of Capt. H. Frobisher: "To banish dice, cardes playeing, and all filthie talk, and to serve God twice a daie with the ordinaire service usuall in the Church of England"). Gradually this good custom seems to have lapsed; and the Church does not seem to have realised the serious damage that accrued thereby. Nevertheless, S. and fishermen were not altogether uncared for by the Church ashore, which ministered to their families constantly and to them when ashore, held special services for fishermen, and, in the Lit., interceded for those "that travel by water." But in time it became clear that some special organisation was needed for men who were so often away from home, and whose lives were so different from those of ordinary people.

First, an attempt was made to reach them through the building of Mariners' Churches, which were in some cases endowed. These were well filled at first with seafaring congregations, but naturally in time the number of shore-folk increased, and sea-going men were conspicuously few. Church Ships again were established in several ports; some of the old naval ships being adapted for the purpose.

In 1856 the Missions to S. Society was formed with the avowed object of "seeking the spiritual welfare of the seafaring classes at home and abroad, using every means consistent with the principles and received practice of the Church of England and carrying on its operations mainly afloat." Chaplains and Scripture Readers were appointed, and boats placed at their disposal, for the visitation of ships in roadsteads and harbours.

After a while S.'s Institutes, free and open to seamen of every creed and nationality, with Mission Churches attached, were erected in all the principal seaports at home, and in many ports abroad. The paged PB was used regularly, both in week-day and Sunday services, and men were encouraged to buy Bibles and PBs for themselves and use them at sea. Temperance principles were strongly advocated, wholesome recreation provided, and knowledge of first aid imparted to many. The Missions to S. Society has now (1911) agents in 99 seaports, 33 of which are abroad, employs 275 agents including 61 chaplains, has 138 S.'s Churches and Institutes, and 75 steam and motor vessels.

In 1864 the St. Andrew's Waterside Church Mission was founded, strongly emphasising the principle that the parochial clergy of waterside parishes are directly responsible for their parishioners serving afloat, and for all those who come into their midst.

Grants are given to vicars of waterside parishes stimulating their interest in S., and in many cases enabling them to provide extra clergy. Grants are also given to British chaplains at colonial and foreign seaports. Some 12,000 ships have been supplied with good lending libraries through this society.

Encouraging officers to hold services at sea has been an important feature both of St. Andrew's Waterside and the Missions to S., and the latter Society has issued special books of pr. for use at sea compiled from the PB. Both Societies have distributed immense quantities of wholesome literature on board ship.

The Gibraltar Mission to S., under the Bp. of Gibraltar, cares for S. in all the principal parts of Mediterranean, Spanish and Portuguese coasts, giving grants to local Chaplains, supplying Scripture Readers who visit S. on board ship or in hospital and supporting S.'s institutes.

The St. Andrew's Waterside and the North Sea Church Mission have sent out Church ships to minister to the men in the fishing fleets in the North Sea. But these men have been mainly reached, in home waters and off the coast of Labrador, through the Hospital Ships of the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, which is interdenominational.

The Seamen's Friendly Society of St. Paul, which works on the Brotherhood system, provides a home for aged S., a shelter for sick and convalescent seamen, and a Receiving House from which to get unemployed men away to sea.

In the School Ships for the training of officers, and in various Training, Industrial, and Reformatory Ships, PB services are held regularly, boys are taught the Church Cat. and prepared by their chaplains for Confirm. and HC.

Sailors' Homes, or large boarding establishments created in the principal ports with special facilities for S., have in some cases been closely connected with the Church, and even licensed for the celebration of HC.

From the above facts it will be seen that the PB has been much used by S., who reverence its antiquity, profit by its standard of faith and devotion, and value its aids to united Worship.—ST, TE.

SECRETARY (BISHOP'S).—The office of Bp.'s S. is of comparatively recent growth, and, though recognised by Act of Parliament, is an office rather of convenience than of necessity. The S. has no fixed tenure of his office. He assists and attends upon the Bp. and prepares legal documents in connection with certain official matters, e.g., Ordinations, Institutions, and Consecrations. The S. is paid by fees, partially fixed by Act of Parliament, of which he is required to make an annual return to the Home Secretary.—A3.

SENTENCE (OF HOLY SCRIPTURE).—In our present PB there are three sets of Sentences of Scripture: (1) before MEP, (2) Offertory Sentences, (3) in Burial Service: and in the First PB there was another: (4) Post-Communion Sentences.

(1) Before MEP. These, as well as what follows as far as the Lord's Prayer, were introduced in 1552, and constituted an entirely novel way of beginning the Divine Service. It has been asserted that they were in part suggested by the Lenten Capitula at Lauds in the Brev., but on grounds far too slender. They have remained without change ever since, with the exception of the first, in which, in 1662, Ezek. 18 27 (AV) was substituted for: "At what time soever a sinner doth repent him of his sin from the bottom of his heart, I will put all his wickedness out of my remembrance, saith the Lord." At the same time the wording of the other Ss. was conformed to the AV, and the latter clause of the last, "But if," etc., was added. In the Scottish PB (1637) there are the following variations: in the first S., Ezek. 18 31, 32 (AV) was substituted for "At what time," etc.; the second S. was omitted, as well as "Repent ye," and "I will arise"; one new S. was introduced (Prov. 28 13); and a few verbal alterations were made in others. In the Amer. PB (1792) three additional Ss. were appointed: Hab. 2 20, Mal. 1 11, Ps. 19 14, 15. In the later revision of this PB, finally approved in 1892, these were retained, and many new Ss., differing for MP and EP, were added, most of them being assigned more or less appropriately to the various seasons of the Christian year. The Ss. at MP are: Hab. 2 20, Ps. 122 1, Ps. 19 14, 15, Phil. 1 2; then (Adv.) Matt. 3 2, Is. 40 3; (Christmas) Luke 2 10, 11; (Epiph.) Mal. 1 11, Is. 52 1; (Good Fr.) Lam. 1 12; (Easter) Mark 16 6 combined with Luke 24 34, Ps. 118 24; (Asc.) Heb. 4 14, 16; (Whitsun.) Gal. 4 6, Ps. 46 4, John 4 23; (Trin. Sun.) Rev. 4 8. Then follow all the Ss. in our PB, except "Repent ye," already used for Advent. At EP: Hab. 2 20, Ps. 26 8, 141 2, 96 9, 19 14, 15; then (Adv.) Mark 13 35, 36, Matt. 3 2; (Christmas) Rev. 21 3; (Epiph.) Mal. 1 11, Is. 2 3, 3; (Good Fr.) 2 Cor. 5 21, Eph. 1 7; (Easter) Col. 3 1; (Asc.) Heb. 9 24; (Whitsun.) Rev. 22 17, Ps. 43 3; (Trin. Sun.)

Is. 6 3. Then follow the Ss. from our PB, as at MP. It may be remarked that these Amer. additions quite lose sight of the original purpose of the Ss., which was to lead up to the Confession of sin; and hence stand in no logical connection with the Exh. which follows them.

(2) Offertory Sentences. In 1549 these are clearly intended to replace the ANTIPHON called Offertorium, which, like the INTROIT, varied for each Mass, and they are directed preferably to be sung. But this direction disappears in 1552. Except for trifling verbal alterations they have remained unchanged, never having been conformed to the AV.

In the Scottish PB (1637) a widely different selection of Offertory Ss. was given, and all were conformed to the AV. They are: Gen. 4 3-5, Ex. 25 2, Deut. 16 16, 17, 1 Chron. 29 10 ff., Ps. 96 1, Matt. 6 19, 20, Matt. 7 21, Mark 12 41-44, 1 Cor. 9 7, 1 Cor. 9 11, 1 Cor. 9 13, 14, 2 Cor. 9 6, 7, Gal. 6 6, 7, 1 Tim. 6 17-19, Heb. 6 10, Heb. 13 16. The first five and the eighth of these are not in our PB. In the present Scottish office, the Ss. are as in 1637, except that the fourth is omitted in this place; but at the end of the Ss. it is ordered that part of it is on every occasion to be said by the priest when presenting the offerings of the people on the altar. The present Amer. PB prefixes Acts 20 35 to the Offertory Ss. in our PB, and adds at the end of them Ex. 25 2, Deut. 16 16, 17, 1 Chron. 29 11, 1 Chron. 29 14. In the Irish PB, the offertory Ss. are the same as in the English, except that the two from Tobit are omitted.

(3) The Ss. in the Burial Service are of the nature of ANTIPHONS, intended to be sung when possible. The first (John 11 25, 26) was the antiphon to Benedictus at Lauds, and the second (Job 19 25-27) was the first Respond at Mattins, in the Sar. Office for the Dead. The third (1 Tim. 6 7, Job 1 21) had not been in ancient use. In like manner the first of the Ss. at the Committal (Job 14 1, 2) is the beginning of the 5th Lesson at Mattins of the Dead; that which follows (In the midst, etc.) was sung with Nunc Dimittis at Compline in Lent. The S. (I heard, etc., Rev. 14 13) was the antiphon to Magnificat in Vespers of the Dead.

(4) Post-Communion Sentences. In 1549 a set of Ss. was provided for singing, "every day one," after the communion of the people, and most strangely entitled Post-Communion Sentences. Communions, a term which had hitherto always designated certain variable Collects said at this point of the service, preceded by an antiphon (also varying for each Mass) called the Communion. It is, of course, with this antiphon that the Ss. in question correspond. These so-called Post-Communions are: Matt. 16 24, Mark 13 13, Luke 1 68, 75, 12 37, 12 40, 12 47, John 4 23, 5 14, 8 31, 32, 12 36, 14 21, 14 23, 15 7, 15 8, 15 12, Rom. 8 31, 32, 8 33, 34, 13 12, 1 Cor. 1 30, 31, 3 16, 17, 6 20, Eph. 5 1, 2. They were discarded in 1552, and have never been replaced.—B2.

SEPTUAGESIMA.—See FESTIVAL, § 15; also next article.

SEPTUAGESIMA, ETC., RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.—The title of Septuagesima suggests its relation to Easter, and thus inaugurates a new devotional period; the sub-title is "the Third Sunday before Lent."

Septuagesima
Sunday.

The Eucharistic suggestions for the day are: (1) in the Collect, "justly punished," and "mercifully delivered"; in the Epistle (1 Cor. 9 24-27), the persevering labour necessary to obtain the reward, and the possibility of being a castaway; (3) in the Gospel (Matt. 20 1-16, the Parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard), the duty of working for God, with the solemn distinction between first and last, between called and chosen.

All the Lessons for the day, at both MP and EP, set before us the two creations, the old and the new—the natural and the spiritual.

The Eucharistic suggestions were very clear in the Pre-Reformation services for Sexagesima Sunday. The Collect ran thus:

Sexagesima.

"God, who seest that we put not our trust in anything that we do, mercifully grant that by the protection of the Teacher of the Gentiles we may be defended against all adversity." The Epistle (2 Cor. 11 19-31) followed naturally, recounting the privations and sufferings of the great Teacher of the Gentiles in preaching the faith; while the Gospel (Luke 8 4-15, the Parable of the Sower) spoke of the responsibilities of those who hear and receive that faith. The sequence in the PB services is less perceptible. But the special Lessons are suggestive: Adam's Temptation and Fall (Gen. 3), the Ark (Gen. 6), the Flood (Gen. 8).

On Quinquagesima Sunday, being the Sunday next before Lent, the Church brings before us the grace of love, without which all our Lenten exercises and devotions will be in vain. In the Collect we pray for this great gift. The Epistle (1 Cor. 13) contains what has well been called the "triumph-song of love"—St. Paul's description of love and its superiority to all other graces and virtues. The Gospel (Luke 18 31-43) shows us our Lord's love to man; he is hastening to Jerusalem to suffer and die, and yet he stops on the way to listen to the blind man's cry and restore his sight. So, too, the special Lessons record God's love to Noah (Gen. 9 1-19) and to Abraham (Gen. 12), while Gen. 13 contains a striking example of man's self-denying love to his fellow-man.—G17. W. J. SPARROW SIMPSON.

SEQUENCE.—Before the 8th cent. the custom arose of continuing the music of the last syllable of the ALLELUIA before the reading of the Gospel. This was the jubilatio or sequentia (Sequence), sung at first at great length to the syllable "a," and, in the 9th cent., to rhythmical and antiphonal prose fitted to the ancient melodies. Hence the name Proses by which Ss. are sometimes called. In later times metrical HYMNS on some occasions took the place of the older Proses.—HB, 92.

MAURICE F. BELL.

SEQUESTRATION is a Mandate issuing from the Bp. to certain persons to receive and apply the revenues of an eccles. benefice, and may either be founded on a King's writ or it may issue originally from the Bp. (as when it is founded on a sentence of SUSPENSION). In the first instance, the Bp. acts merely ministerially and in aid of the sheriff who has no power to levy on ecclesiastical possessions. In practice, the King's writ is taken to the Bp.'s REGISTRAR, who issues the Mandate upon the nominated Sequestrator giving security. The S. takes effect from its publication (usually, by affixing it to the ch. door), and is not retrospective. The Sequestrator is subject to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical Court and to the directions of the Bp. The High Court has the same power over the Bp. as over the Sheriff. The writ is mandatory on the Bp., and he is obliged to execute it. The powers of the Bp. and certain disabilities of the incumbent are prescribed by the S. Act, 1871. The Sequestrator is a sort of bailiff, and his duty is to collect the revenues and, after providing for the duties of the cure and for dilapidation-money when assessed by the Diocesan Surveyor, to pay the surplus to the judgment creditor until he has satisfied his debt. In the case of incumbents presented or collated after January 1st, 1899, if on bankruptcy or upon any writ the benefice of any such incumbent is sequestered within twelve months after his institution, or if issued after that period and continued for the space of one whole year, or if any such incumbent incurs two such Ss. in the space of two years, the benefice shall, unless the Bp. otherwise direct, become void as on a S. under s. 58 of the Pluralities Act, 1838, for disobedience to the Bp.'s monition to an incumbent to reside on his benefice (Benefices Act, 1898). There are many cases in which a Bp. acting judicially may issue an original mandate of S. The most common is the avoidance of a benefice, so that its profits or emoluments may not be wasted or unprofitably applied. Such a S. is almost invariably directed to the churchwardens, and comes to an end on the induction of the new incumbent. Under the Pluralities Act, 1838, the Bp. is empowered to sequester the profits of an ecclesiastical benefice in many cases, e.g., for NON-RESIDENCE, non-payment of stipend of assistant curate, illegal trading. A S. under this Act has priority over any other Ss. Dilapidation-money is also enforceable by S. against the new incumbent. Apart from statutory authority, the Bp. may issue a S. during the insanity of an incumbent.—A5. T. H. ARDEN.

SERMON, PLACE OF, IN SERVICE.—In the PB, after the Nicene Cr. in HC, the following rubric occurs:—"Then shall follow the Sermon, or one of the Homilies already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth by authority." This is the only direction for a S. in connection with the ordinary Services of the Ch. In Ord.¹ and Ord.² it is directed by the first rubric that the S. shall be preached after MP is ended and before the Lit. and HC are begun. And in the Marriage Service it is implied by the rubric before the concluding Exh. that a S. may be preached. The PB contains no direction that a S. shall follow EP (but cp. CATECHISING). When it occurs, it may be regarded as a separate or additional service. The Bp., however, has the legal power to order at his discretion two full services, each to include a S. or Lecture, on every Sunday throughout the year in the ch. or chapel of any benefice (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 80). Under the Act of Unif. Amendment Act of 1872, MP and EP, the Lit., and HC may any of them be used without the preaching of a S. or Lecture or the reading of a Homily; and a S. or Lecture may be preceded either by one of the services appointed by the PB, or by a service authorised by that Act, or by a Coll. taken from the PB with or without the Lord's Pr. (35 and 36 Vict. c. 35, §§ 5, 6).

It is interesting to observe that the custom recently adopted in some chs. of having a S. after MP and before the beginning of HC was apparently approved and adopted by Bp. Andrewes (see his notes on the PB; also RITUAL, § 61 f.).

LUCIUS SMITH.

SERVER.—The obvious meaning of this term is "one who serves." It is usually applied to him who assists the priest in different ways in Divine Service, but more especially when he celebrates the Holy Euch. There is little doubt that these duties were anciently performed by the clerk, or, as he was called, the "collet," i.e., the acolytus, the title given in the Sarum books to the candle-bearer. In the Liber Niger of Lincoln the cross-bearers are called clerici. These might in the widest sense be called servers. In our day the term is applied in the limited sense to him who assists the priest at the altar, and the evidence goes to prove that, failing the presence of any other minister in priest's or deacon's orders, it was the clerk who assisted the priest or in other words "served." Abp. Grindal in 1575 ordered that the parish clerk should read the first lesson and the epistle, and previously the directions given in the Communion Office of the First PB of Edward VI and in the companion of that book—the Clerk's Book—point to the clerk being appointed to read the epistle. The vesting of the clerk in a surplice and the custom of his reading the Epistle as well as the Lessons is known to have prevailed in some places up to quite recent times.

With a view to dignifying the celebration of HC it would seem fitting that the priest should not be unattended. The duties of the S.,

2. The Modern Server. as now generally understood, are to receive the alms after collection and bring them to the priest, to bring the bread and wine from the credence, to lead the Conf., and, aft. the Blessing, to bring the wine and water to the priest for the cleansing of the chalice and paten.

It is desirable that those who assist the priest should not be serving-boys, which is a modern Roman practice. A boy should only serve when no minister in holy orders or clerk is present to assist.

It is needless to say that the S. should perform his duties with devotion, reverence, care and attention, and without fuss.—R2. H. D. MACNAMARA.

SERVICE-BOOKS.—See BOOKS (LITURGICAL).

SERVICES, ADDITIONAL.—By Additional Services are meant services held in ch. in addition to those prescribed in the PB. Some of these are authorised by immemorial custom; others by permission of some lawful authority, e.g., the Crown, the ORDINARY (see further, SHORTENED SERVICES Act). Of the former class we may mention:—BENEFACTORS (COMMEMORATION OF); CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES; CORONATION; ENTHRONEMENT; INDUCTION; INSTALLATION; INSTITUTION; TOUCHING FOR KING'S EVIL (now obsolete). For a description of some of the latter, reference may be made to the following arts.:—CATECHISM (THE SYSTEM); DEDICATION FESTIVAL; HARVEST FESTIVAL; MISSION (A PAROCHIAL); THREE HOURS' SERVICE. Fuller details may be found in the Priest's Prayer Book, and in sundry diocesan manuals.—A4. J. W. TYRER.

SERVICES (MUSICAL).—See ANTHEMS, § 6.

SEXES, SEPARATION OF, IN CHURCH.—

This seems to have been the universal practice in Christian antiquity. Sometimes (Didasc.) the women sat behind the men, as among the E.Syrians to-day; sometimes (Test. of our Lord, etc.) there were "porches" (galleries, or divisions of some sort)—one for men, and one for women. In Apost. Const. we read of the two sexes entering by separate doors, the deacons standing at the men's door, the sub-deacons at the women's. Catechumens and children were also placed in separate parts of the church. The references are: Older Didascalia 2 57 (ed. Funk, 1, p. 164; ed. Gibson, p. 65 f.; 3rd cent. ?); Can. of Hippolytus 17 97; Test. of our Lord 1 19, 2 4; Egypt. Ch. Order 43; Ethiop. CO. 32; Apost. Const. 2 57; Cyril of Jer., Cat. Lect., Intro. 14 (apparently); Chrysostom, Hom. 73 in Matt., who speaks of a partition between the men and the women, etc. The separation of the sexes at worship, common to Jews and Mo'lems, is still the rule in the East. By a similar rule the kiss of peace was to be given by men to men and by women to women (Test. of our Lord 2 4; Egypt. CO. 43; Apost. Const. 2 57). The only manual, which allow women to enter within the sanctuary with the clergy are the Testament and the Arab. Didasc., and that only for the "widows" and deaconesses; this was forbidden at Laodicea, c. A.D. 380 (can. 41). The PB of 1549 ordered the separation of male and female communicants; and the separation has remained in many English churches throughout the services (see Hier. Ang., 2nd ed., 2 60 ff.).—R2.

A. J. MACLEAN.

SEXT.—The office to be recited at the 6th hour, i.e., noon. But on ordinary days, when said in choir, it immediately preceded the principal Mass, probably not much later than 9 a.m. (See HOURS OF PRAYER.)—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

SEXTON.—(Said to be abbreviated from "sacristan.") Some modern dictionaries assign to him the sacristan's duties, which can only fall to him if there be but one ch. officer.) Since the Reformation there have been two parish officers, the clerk and the S., both holding, if formally appointed, freeholds. Before that date, there were two officers, the clerk and under-clerk, but it is not clear whether they had under them an inferior officer, called S., who undertook the more menial offices in the church, or whether these fell to the under-clerk. From the 16th cent. downwards the S. has had to dig the graves. In the 17th cent. he also used to keep the keys of the ch., to open and shut it, to keep it clean, and to ring the bells. These duties belonged, in the Middle Ages, to the clerk. The S. carried the wand (or "verge") at the head of a procession. In many parish churches the same person is both S. and vergier.—In the early church, graves were dug by the copiatas, or fossarii.—A3. J. E. SWALLOW.

SHELL, BAPTISMAL.—A small vessel (usually a S., or made in shape of a S., whence the name) for pouring the water on the head in Bapt. It does not appear to have been employed in England in the Middle Ages, Bapt. by immersion being then the rule. It is, however, convenient, though by no means necessary, to use one in administering that Sacrament. See BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 36 (k).—R3.

J. W. TYRER.

SHORTENED SERVICES ACT (Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict., c. 35).—Several paragraphs of the Pref. and other parts of the PB enjoin MEP "daily to be said and used throughout the year"; an exception is, however, permitted in case of the "curate's" sickness or absence from home. Canons 14 and 15 of 1604 seem to imply that considerable latitude was allowed with regard to this rule, as they only direct public Service on Sundays, Holy-days, Wednesdays and Fridays. It appears then that, as the Day Hours system had failed in the 16th cent., so again half a cent. later the daily use of the simplified MEP was neglected.

The revival of rubrical order in the middle of the 19th cent. gradually restored the use of daily Services; but this was naturally accompanied by much variety in practice, e.g., the omission of the Exh. or of some of the Prs. after the Colls.—omissions for which no lawful authority could be claimed. In 1872, after due authorisation by the Convs., the SSA. laid down limitations on these variations. Of those now in use a few depend upon the inherent right of a Bp. to settle the services in his diocese, but most upon the action of the Convs. and the SSA.; failing these, they have no authority.

The following provisions of the Act are worthy of notice. The Preamble refers to the obligation imposed by the Act of Uniformity (1662), to the Report of Commissioners (1869-70) upon differences of practice and varying interpretations, and to the Report of the Convs. of Canterbury and York. Incidentally, in secs. 3 and 4, the use of hymns and anthems other than those in the PB is recognised and authorised. Further, sec. 6 provides alternative preambles to the Sermon when it does not form part of HC.

The limitation, in sec. 3, of the powers of the Ordinary confines all special Services to anthems, hymns, and parts of the Bible and PB. Notwithstanding this, services are set forth from time to time which do not fall under the liberty allowed. On days of National Thanksgiving or Humiliation, in times of War, Famine, or Elections, and when there is a vacancy in a bishopric or incumbency, it has been customary for the Bps. to allow prs. which do not fall under the letter of the Act. In some cases, an Order in Council suspends the operation of the statutory prohibition, and the inherent right of a Bp. to order the services in his diocese resumes its free action. Other cases seem to be in their nature outside the relation of the Ch. and the State, and yet not to be included under the permissive powers which the SSA. gives. [The contents of the Act and its Schedule are summarised under RITUAL, § 18 B 2^d n. 4 and § 25 D 1st n. 3—see also § 60. The full text is prefixed to the large ch. copies of the PB.]—A4, B2.

PERCIVAL JACKSON.

SHRINE.—A Shrine is a fixed erection (often of great beauty) in which the relics of some saint are placed in a ch. for the veneration of the faithful. At the Reformation all Ss. in Eng. were ordered to be destroyed, and this order was generally carried out. Two, however, still remain perfect and contain the body of the saint (St. Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey, and St. White at Whitechurch Canonicoorum in Dorset; see F. Bond, Westminster Abbey, p. 235), while considerable portions of some other Ss. have been preserved (e.g., St. Alban at St. Albans).—R6. J. W. TYRER.

SHROVE TUESDAY.—The day bef. Ash-Wednesday, so called because people in the Middle Ages were accustomed to confess their sins (shrive themselves) that day. As being the English Carnival, it was naturally, and is still to some extent, a day of festivity. The Sunday bef. (Quinquagesima) was at one time popularly called Shrove Sunday.—G19.

J. W. TYRER.

SI QUIS.—A si quis is a notice publicly read, during divine service, in the ch. of the parish where a candidate for either the diaconate, or the priesthood, is residing. The notice states that the candidate intends to offer himself as a candidate for ordination at the ensuing ordination of the Lord Bishop of—, and "if any person (si quis) knows any just cause or impediment for which he ought not to be admitted to Holy Orders, he is to declare the same or to signify it forthwith to the said Bp." A certificate that the notice has been duly published is attached to it, and is to be signed by the officiating minister and the churchwardens. Any bona fide signification to the Bp. of alleged unfitness would be a privileged communication, for which no action for libel would lie, and ought in all cases to be made, as it is of the greatest possible importance that unfit persons should not be admitted to the sacred ministry. No one should shrink from making such communication, however unpleasant the duty of doing so may be.—ra.

E. G. WOOD.

SICK, COMMUNION OF.—From very early days the Communion of the Sick has always been a matter of affectionate care

1. The Communion of the Sick. to the Church. Justin Martyr (I Apol. 65) writes: "The deacons communicate each of those present with the consecrated bread and wine and water, and carry away a portion to the absent." Presumably among these "absent" there would be, from time to time, sick brethren. Gradually this reservation led to abuses which entailed disciplinary reform tending (inter alia) to the discouragement of celebrations in any other place than a ch.; but an exception was probably made in favour of the sick. That this was exceptional is proved by a lengthy catena of passages to that effect quoted by Scudamore (Notitia Eucharistica, ed. 2, pp. 1029 ff.); and our own 71st canon of 1604 states that "No Minister shall preach or administer the HC in any private house, except it be in times of necessity, when any, being either so impotent that he cannot go to the Ch., or very dangerously sick, are desirous to be partakers of the Holy Sacrament."

In England prior to the Reformation the sick person was communicated with the reserved Sac. (see RESERVATION), and, of course, in one kind only. The

2. PB of 1549.

PB of 1549 allowed the continuance of Reservation from "the open Communion" for a sick person on the day of the celebration, but in both kinds. When communion was thus made, the service at the house consisted of the General Confession, Absolution, Comfortable Words, Communion and Prayer of Thanksgiving ("Almighty and Everlasting God, etc..").

Under other conditions a form for a private celebration in the house was also provided:—Introit (Ps. 117 with Gloria); "Lord have mercy," etc.; "The Lord be with you," etc.; Coll., Ep. and Gospel, as in present PB; "The Lord be with you," etc.; "Lift up your hearts," etc., unto the end of the Canon. The rubric further ordered that, if more sick people were to be communicated on the same day, the Curate was to reserve (from the private celebration) "so much of the sacrament of the body and blood as shall serve the other sick persons and such as be appointed to communicate with them (if there be any); and shall immediately carry it and minister it unto them." Such a private celebration for the sick was more or less of a novelty in 1549, although celebrations in houses were not unknown, and it was only intended as an alternative for the older practice.

The present English Office was practically brought into its present form in 1552, when the rubrics authorising Reservation were omitted. In 1662 the direction was added for the HC to be celebrated in a shortened form, passing at once from the special Coll., Ep. and Gospel to "Ye that do truly." Much controversy has arisen over the third of the five final rubrics ("But if a man, either by reason of extremity," etc.). It should be remembered that this rubric represents the old Sarum one, "Crede, et manducasti" (see SICK, ORDER FOR V.); and it is unfair reasoning which arbitrarily (and untruly) deduces from it that the actual participation of the Sacrament is a matter of indifference to the Ch. of England. The cumulative evidence points unmistakably in the opposite direction.

In the Irish PB the following rubric occurs: "If the sick person be very weak and necessity so require, it shall suffice to use for this office, the Confession, Absolution, Prayer of Consecration, Form of Delivery of the Sacrament, Lord's Prayer and Blessing."

Two additional rubrics are found in the Amer. PB, one authorising an abbreviated form (akin to the Irish, but somewhat longer) in contagious sickness, etc.; the other sanctioning the use of the Coll., Ep. and Gospel of the day (in lieu of those appointed in the Office itself) when the priest is ministering to "aged and bed-ridden persons." In the "Visitation of Prisoners" there is provided a Form of HC for Persons under sentence of death with special Coll., Ep. (Heb. 12 11) and Gospel (John 5 24). [See further, RITUAL, § 46.]—N7.

H. E. SCOTT.

SICK, ORDER FOR THE VISITATION OF.—The Ch. has always been most zealous in her care of the sick and the dying. VS is not simply a social amenity; it is a definite act of religion, based (generally) upon our Lord's constant affection for the suffering, and (specifically) upon direct apostolic precept. This is traceable in the Fathers from sub-apostolic times and also in the canons of early Councils; and it has, of course, passed into the practice of the Ch. of Eng.:—"ut quoties fuerint accersiti, celeriter accedant et hilariter ad aegrotos" (Lyndwode, Prov. Const. 1 2). So also canon 67, "Ministers to visit the Sick," and the charge to deacons at their Ordination ("to search for the sick"; cp. the striking addition of the Council of Milan, "etiamsi non vocati inuisant"). [See further, for the pastoral duty, VISITATION OF THE SICK.]

The present English Office is based upon that of the Sar. Manual which comprised:—(1)

Order for VS; (2) Extreme Unction; (3) Commendation of the soul. As the procession of the Priest and his Clerks neared the sick man's house the seven PENITENTIAL PSALMS were said (with their ANTIPHON), and when the house was reached it was saluted in the form prescribed by our Lord (Luke 10 5). The sick man, was first sprinkled with holy water, and then Vs., Rs., and nine prs. for his recovery followed. The succeeding part of the service was intended to move him to acts of faith and repentance, leading on to UNCTION and Communion (see SICK, COMMUNION OF). Thus, he was examined on and instructed in the Faith, moved to acts of charity and restitution, his confession was received, and Absolution given. Extreme Unction was then administered; and the communion of the sick man followed, "nisi prius communicatus fuerit: et nisi de vomitu vel alia irreverentia probabiliter timeatur"; in which case the priest was to assure the sick man, "Frater, in hoc casu sufficit tibi vera fides, et bona voluntas: tantum crede, et manducasti" (cp. 3rd rubric at end of Communion of the Sick, and Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia 1 89, n. 11). The Commendation of the soul closed this remarkable and touching threefold Office.

The present English Office preserves all the Sar. features save the Procession to the house, the seven Penitential Pss. (replaced by the 71st, together with the only recognisable Antiphon now remaining in the PB), and the administration of Extreme Unction. In the Sar. book it was assumed that the sick man would make his confession, but between 1549 and 1662 this was left optional. In the latter year a striking change was made in the rubric, to the effect that the Minister should move the sick man to confess, if he felt his conscience troubled by any weighty matter. In any case, however, it seems that confession is to be preceded by instruction, exhortation and prayer as a triple preparation for the unburdening of the soul.

The PB Office of VS consists of the following parts:

- (1) Salutation of the house and its inmates;
- (2) Obsecration and Response (from the Lit.), Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., Vs. and Rs.;
- (3) Prs. for (a) bodily relief, (b) spiritual comfort;
- (4) Exh. to repentance and faith¹ (with formal profession of belief);

¹ In the Sar. the sick man was questioned on 14 articles of the Faith, 7 relating to the Holy Trinity and 7 relating to the Humanity of Christ.

(5) Examination of the sick man as to Repentance, Charity, Restitution and Worldly affairs¹ (with special reference to liberality to the poor);

(6) Private Confession of sin and Absolution;

(7) Pr. for mercy and strengthening (the original Absol. of dying penitents in the Sar. Manual);

(8) Ps. 71 with Antiphon;

(9) Commendation and Aaronic Blessing (Num. 6 24-26).

An Appendix of four Prs. was added in 1662 for particular cases: (a) a sick child; (b) for the sick when there is small hope of recovery; (c) a Commendation of the soul for a dying person; (d) for one troubled in mind or conscience. They have not been traced to any ancient source, but (inter alia) contain beautiful applications to the sufferer of the prs. and promises of holy scripture (cp. also the quotations in the Exh. "Take therefore in good part").

The Scottish Office of 1637 is (with a few minute differences) practically a reproduction of that in the PB of 1552. The

^{4.} Other PBs. Irish PB follows the present Eng. VS, but instead of the Absol. in the Eng. Office that from the Service of HC is prescribed with a modified rubric, and an alternative is provided for the Pr. following. After the special Prs. at the end there is added A Prayer for a sick person, when his sickness has been mercifully assuaged. The Office in the Amer. PB is the same as the present English with the following exceptions:—(1) the rubric as to a special Conf. of sin and the special Absol. are omitted; (2) Ps. 130 is substituted for Ps. 71; (3) three additional Prs. are added, For all present at the Visitation (taken from the writings of Bp. Jeremy Taylor), In case of sudden surprise and immediate danger, A thanksgiving for the beginning of a Recovery. [See, for variorum text of rubrics in full, RITUAL, § 45.]

The very structure and contents of the Office at once emphasise its character as a formal rite to be used either only once in life or at ^{5.} Use of the Office of VS. least very rarely. This aspect is strengthened by the following considerations. It took the place of the Sar. Extreme Unction, and, whilst quietly dropping the mediæval distortion of Jas. 5 14, 15, it retained (in the PB of 1549) the optional use of anointing. Again, the careful instruction and examination in the Faith, and (since 1662) the urged opportunity of private confession together with the distinct (and Post-Reformation) reference to wills, debts, and bequests to the poor, and (though it cannot be so strongly pressed) the deliberate retention of the spirit of the Sarum "Crede et manducasti" in the accompanying Office for the Communion of the Sick—all these, considered cumulatively, would point to the Office of VS being reserved for use in extremis. Moreover, its strictly liturgical character marks it out as an office to be used (in its entirety) for instructed people who are in full communion with the Ch. and have been under her guidance and discipline. As they are fully conversant with the Ch.'s system and her services, the Office will not appear strange and tortuous to them: it will be eminently helpful and will prepare them for the pending dissolution. Contrariwise, it could not be used (with edification) for ill-informed or irreligious people, until there has been much instruction, and (which is of still greater importance) much progress towards true and lasting penitence.

The old Sar. Office brought to the sick chamber all the solemnity and dignity of the Ch. by the opening rubric, "In primis induat se sacerdos ^{6.} Ritual of VS. superpellicio cum stola, et in eundo dicat cum suis ministris septem psalmos paenitentiales." Bp. Cosin, in his revised book, attempted something of the same kind by reviving the ancient custom of directing the attendance of one lay Clerk with the Priest; and the Amer. Ch. (vide supra), by the provision of a special Pr. on their behalf, assumes that some members of the sick man's family or other friends will have the charity to pray with him and for him.¹ [See also UNCTION, VISITATION OF THE SICK.]—N.

SICK, UNCTION OF.—See UNCTION.

SIDESMEN (Synodmen or Sidemen).—Two or more are annually to be chosen in ancient parishes in Easter Week by the minister and parishioners if they can agree, or, if not, are to be appointed by the bishop, to assist the churchwardens as to the attendance and good behaviour of the parishioners at church (can. 90). They are admitted with the churchwardens (cp. art. CHURCHWARDEN), making a declaration that they will faithfully and diligently assist the churchwardens in performing the duties of that office (Statutory Declarations Act, 1835, s. 9), and they continue to act till the next admission of churchwardens (can. 118). They are frequently also appointed in new ecclesiastical parishes. They are sometimes ex-officio members of voluntarily constituted Parochial Church Councils. (See further, Smith's Law of Churchwardens and Sidesmen, Wells Gardner & Co.)—A3.

P. V. SMITH.

SIGN OF THE CROSS.—The use of the sign of the C. dates back to an exceedingly early period in the Church's history. It

^{1.} Early Use. was defended scripturally from such passages as Ezek. 9 4, Rev. 7 3, etc. The making of the sign probably came into existence as a Christian answer to the contempt for the C. exhibited on all sides by Jew and heathen alike. It was used quite early on all kinds of secular occasions. Tertullian has a passage in his De Corona Militis (3), which is usefully illustrative: "In all our travels and movements, in all our coming in and going out, in putting on our sandals, at the bath, at the table, in lighting our candles, in lying down, in sitting down, whatever occupation engages us, we mark our foreheads with the sign of the C." Once thus used, there gradually grew up a series of reasons for its use. It was used to show that the users were Christians, to remind themselves and others of the power of Christ crucified in temptation and danger, to drive away the devil and his angels, to be a remedy and charm against special temptations and the onset of diseases, and finally to purify places and things from any taint of evil. In these early days the sign was made upon the forehead of the person and once or thrice upon the thing concerned. The modern use of both the Greek and Roman Church has departed from the primitive form which the Church of England retains. In the Church of Rome the sign is made by touching first the forehead, then the breast, then the left and right shoulder. In the Greek Church the shoulders are touched first and then the hand is drawn down the centre of the body.

Although testimony to the ecclesiastical use is not so early as that to its use in secular and individual matters, the use in religious rites and ceremonies is probably almost as old.

2. Ecclesiastical Use.

Before the 6th cent. the sign of the C. was made at the reception of catechumens, at Bapt., at Confirm., and perhaps somewhat later it was used in the rite of Ordination (when the sign was made on the palms of the hands), and in HC, and later still in Extreme Unction and at the Consecration of churches. As far as we are able to locate it, the original home of the rite seems to have been the Alexandrian and North African churches. Once in use both in public worship and in common life, its reiteration on every conceivable occasion tended on the one hand to make it meaningless, and on the other to make it superstitious. Its ecclesiastical use spread very rapidly in mediæval times until in the Sar. office of the mass it must have been used very nearly, if not quite (it is a little difficult to count), 100 times.

In the First English PB (1549) a real effort was made to recover the simple rite from its meaningless and superstitious associations, by an extreme parsimony in its use. In HC it was used in the Epiclesis only, and in the Bapt. office at the Exorcism and not at the actual ceremony of Bapt. itself. In 1552 its use was confined to the act of admission to the Church in the Bapt. office, and it was entirely dropped elsewhere, and no change has been made since in our Service-Books.

At the Conference of 1603 the Puritans expressed strong objections to its retention in Bapt., and with a view to meet these objections canon of 1604 was drawn up. The canon points out that the Primitive Church rejoiced in the C. despite the ignominy attached to it; that the sign of the C. in early times came into use as an assurance that the early Christians were not ashamed of it, and that it was quite early used in Bapt.; that, although the Church of Rome had abused the sign, the abuse of a thing does not take away the lawful use; that the Church's use is a return to primitive custom and guards against superstition and error. With this latter point in mind the canon goes on to lay down three positions:

(1) the sign is no part of the Sacrament; (2) the child, before it is signed, is, by virtue of Bapt., received into the congregation of Christ's flock and not by any power ascribed unto the sign of the C.; (3) the sign is retained as a true remembrance of the C. and as a lawful outward ceremony and badge whereby the infant is dedicated to Christ. Dr. Burgess added by way of consent to the canon: "I understand that dedication to impart, not a real consecration of the child, which was done in Bapt. itself; but only a ceremonial declaration of that dedication." For the time being the Puritans were amply satisfied, but in the Revision of 1662 a second rubric was added to the Bapt. office, in which the canon was referred to as an explanation of the use of the sign, for the further comfort of those who still felt hesitant. (For Amer. PB see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 23.) The abortive attempt at Revision in 1689 suggested that the officiating minister might at his institution be freed from the use of the sign, and apparently that it might not be used if parents and friends did not so wish. Its use in the Bapt. office is the only case in which it is retained in the public worship of the Church of England. As to its further use the Church is silent, leaving men to judge her mind by her public ordinances or, if they will, entirely free. [Cp. RITUAL, vi.], esp. § 81 and n.—Rz.

SIGNIFICAVIT.—The notification transmitted by the judge of an eccles. court to the royal court (at one time to the high court of Chancery, later to the court of King's Bench, 7 Mod. 57, and now to the Crown Office), certifying that an offender has been duly pronounced guilty of contumacy and contempt, and sentenced to a specified term of imprisonment.

It is in form addressed to the sovereign, and concludes with a prayer for the imprisonment of the offender (53 Geo. III, c. 127 Sched. See Crown Office Rules, 1906, Nos. 243-5, Short and Mellor, Crown Off. Pract., ed. 2, 1908, 371). Cp. EXCOMMUNICATION.—A5.

SIMONY.—S. has been defined as "obtaining orders or a licence to preach by money or any corrupt practice," but it is usually interpreted to signify the crime of buying or selling any ecclesiastical preferment. Several attempts have been made to prohibit this practice, but owing to the skilful evasion of laws they have not always been entirely successful. In the 18th cent. a custom prevailed for the incumbent on accepting a living to give the patron a bond or promise to resign at his pleasure. In 1589 an Act was passed imposing a penalty of double the yearly value of the benefice on those "who either take or make" any simoniacal presentation to it, and the living was in consequence to lapse to the Crown. An Act in Queen Anne's reign prohibited clergy from purchasing for themselves the next presentation to a living; while the Benefices Act, 1808, renders invalid any contract procuring the exercise of the right of presentation in favour of any particular person. It also requires a very stringent declaration to be taken by every clergyman on his acceptance of a benefice, affirming his want of knowledge of, or participation in, any simoniacal agreement in connection with his presentation. The name is derived from the sin of Simon Magus (Acts 8 18, 19).—A5.

SIN.—The only definite Ch. of England doctrinal statements on the subject of S. are in Arts. 9-17; but even here, with the exception of ORIGINAL SIN, the treatment is incidental only, and there is no attempt to define exactly the nature of Sin. Nevertheless a study of the PB itself makes it abundantly clear that the PB doctrine of S., its nature, results and remedies, is in accordance with the teaching of Holy Scripture and the Catholic Church, untainted by any error of either Pelagianism or Calvinism. The Catholic conception of S. is not to be adequately learned from the mere etymology of the various words which have been used to express Sin. S. is much more than a mere failure to reach the true aim of life, a missing of the mark (ἀναπρία), or peccatum (connected with the idea of anger), or a wandering out of the right path, trespass or guiltiness (A. S. synn); more even than a debt owing to God (Lord's Pr.). It can only be fully understood in the light of the Personality and of the love of God. S. to a Christian is a rebellion against personal love. The moral order of the world, as revealed by Scripture and conscience, is the expression of the love of God. Hence S. which sets this order at nought is described as ἀνομία, lawlessness (1 John 3 4). And therefore S., being a breach of love, constitutes a barrier between man and the life of God, and tends to, and involves, spiritual death, unless repented of, forgiven and conquered. At the same time the Church has always firmly held that S. is only a disease, and has no absolute or independent existence. The devil and evil spirits are ministers of S., and wholly and hopelessly under its dominion; but their powers are limited both in extent and duration. They are in no sense rival divinities. Tempting as is the dualistic theory as an explanation of the present moral disorder of the world and the human race, it has been universally rejected by the Church, and finds no place in the PB. Nature and man are not evil in themselves, and steadfast Christian hope looks for the entire removal of S. and the complete recovery of creation in the perfected kingdom of Christ (cp. Coll. 6 Epiph.). Both Christ and His Apostles, while speaking of S. in language of awe-inspiring severity, yet point always to the hope of forgiveness. No S. is represented in Scripture as unpardonable or eternal, except the S. which itself closes the door on repentance, the deliberate resistance to the Holy Spirit (Mk. 3 29, Acts 13 45, 46).

The Incarnation is the Divine remedy for Sin. Thomists and Scotists dispute as to whether S. was the direct cause of the Incarnation, or whether in the Divine counsels it would have taken place, even if man had not fallen. All would, however, agree that the manner of the Incarnate life was conditioned by S., and that the Passion and Death of the Lord were the direct result of Sin. The Church has also universally believed that the Death of Christ was the Divine Sacrifice offered for S. and resulted at the Resurrection in a complete victory over S., and that this is the only hope of human recovery. Hence full forgiveness of sins was for the first time proclaimed to man by the Apostles after the Resurrection and Ascension; and the offer made by Divine grace, through the power of the Holy Spirit, to overcome and destroy Sin. It is these profound and infinitely consoling doctrines respecting S. and its remedy which underlie all the PB expressions concerning it.

The PB is obviously intended for the use of baptised Christians who have accepted the teaching of the Church, and have by Holy Bapt. been delivered from the natural state of S. and alienation from God, and are presumably not living in known and wilful Sin. It is recognised, however, that wilful and impenitent sinners may at all times be within the Church, and attending her services. If possible, such are to be excluded by the sentence of the Bishop from participation in the Lord's Supper (cp. opening Rubrics in HC service). But, as the general relaxation of the early Ch. system of penance renders this exclusion often difficult or impossible, the Communion Service in the plainest and severest language denounces unrepented S., foretells its awful doom as taught by Scripture, and exhorts all to make sure of their repentance.

More generally however, the PB alludes to and deals with the S. which sincere Christians may be tempted to commit after Bapt. during their passage through this world, and with the need of deepening penitence and a growing victory over S. (cp. in addition to Arts. 15, 16, the Colls. for 1 Adv., 4 Adv., Inn., Sept., Ash-W., 1 Lent, 4 Lent, 1 Easter, 2 Easter, 21 Trin., 24 Trin.).

The Christian life, which finds its expression in worship, is regarded in the PB as beginning with the remission of S. original and actual in Bapt., and as thenceforward a continual warfare against S. in self and in the world, constantly in danger, and needing the constant help of Divine grace through pr. and Sacrs. (cp. the concluding Prs. and Exhs. in Bapt. ^{1,2,3}). Following out this teaching, children are in the Cat. warned against common sins in their "Duty" towards their neighbours, and instructed, in the explanation of the Lord's Pr., to pray for forgiveness and deliverance "from all sin and wickedness and from our ghostly enemy"; while, in the requisites for approaching the Sac. of the Lord's Supper, self-examination with a view to true repentance of former sins stands first. In the Confirm. Office it is evidently assumed that the candidates have either never forfeited that state of forgiveness into which they entered at Bapt., or by repentance have regained it (see Bp.'s 1st Pr.).

In the regular services of the PB nothing is more remarkable than the way in which every approach to worship is guarded by the insistence on penitence for Sin. This emphasis is especially the work of the Reformers and the PB of 1552. It was a period of spiritual unrest and reaction. The obligation to private Confession had been removed; lawful liberty easily might lead to licence. Antinomianism to worship is guarded by the insistence on penitence for Sin. This emphasis is especially the work of the Reformers and the PB of 1552. It was a period of spiritual unrest and reaction. The obligation to private Confession had been removed; lawful liberty easily might lead to licence. Antinomianism was abroad, and it was felt necessary to lay special and solemn stress on the reality and power of S. even in regenerate lives. Hence the PB of 1552 prefaces the ancient daily Offices (as they substantially remained in 1549) with the present Sents., Exh., Conf. and Absolution. These, at first prefixed only to MP, were afterwards printed also with EP (which was probably the original intention). The Exh. points out the special fitness of Conf. of S., before God is approached in public thanksgiving and prayer. The Conf. (as has frequently been noticed) seems to lay special emphasis on sins of omission, thus opening a wide and not over-familiar aspect of S. to the Christian conscience.

4. Its Penitential Tone.

The sense of S., its danger and its power, runs through the Lit., especially in the Deprecations, and is emphasised in the characteristic turn of the older "miserere nobis" into "have mercy upon us miserable sinners."

The same penitential tone which marked the daily Offices in the 1552 PB is noticed also in the opening of and indeed throughout the HC Service, the highest and most characteristic act of Christian worship. The Commandments and their Response have taken the place of the older and more jubilant beginning with Introit and Gloria. The Exhs. emphasise in the most solemn manner the peril of approaching the Lord's Table in a state of unrepented sin. The 3rd Exh. gives if possible even a more severe tone than that of St. Paul himself to the warning quoted from 1 Cor. 11 27-32 (where diseases and death are spoken of as a merciful divine "chastening" rather than condemnation). The 1st Exh. prescribes self-examination, suggests the method, and in its concluding paragraph offers the opportunity of private Conf. and "the benefit of Absolution" to all those who cannot quiet their consciences. Indeed it may be said that the main purpose of these Exhs. is to awaken and quicken the sense of S. and the need of true penitence among professing Christians. Again, a Conf. of sin, more fervent and heart-stirring than the earlier one in MP and EP, leads up to the Thanksgiving and Pr. which form the central part of the HC Service. And in the Consecration Pr. the truth most vividly presented and pleaded before the Father is the Death of Christ as the one sacrifice for human sin. The first of the Post-Communion Prs. asks as the first benefit of the Communion which has just been made "remission of sins," not only for the actual communicants but for the "whole Church."

The Office of VS should also be carefully studied for the light it throws on the PB teaching on sin. Both its Prs. and Exhs. dwell on sickness being a call to more earnest self-examination and a more perfect penitence. The sick person is also to be "examined" by the minister "whether he repent him truly of his sins," and he is to be "moved" (encouraged) "to make a special Confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter." And even after the Absol. pr. is renewed for the full pardon of the sick person's sins and the acceptance of his penitence. The Church's godly fear lest any of her members should remain in a state of S., or presume to enter into God's presence without every effort to obtain pardon, seems here to outrun the logical interpretation of the preceding Absolution. Charity for souls can easily reconcile the apparent contradiction.¹

The same spirit is to be felt in the Occ. Prs. which follow the Office. Especially instructive and pathetic is the final appeal to the Divine mercy in the commendatory Pr. "at the point of departure," that

"the blood of the immaculate Lamb" may wash away "whatsoever defilements" the Christian soul "may have contracted in the midst of this miserable and naughty world, through the lusts of the flesh, or the wiles of Satan." The Burial Service, while excluding any direct pr. for the departed, implores, in the Anthems that follow the Lesson, the Divine mercy as the sinners' only hope "at our last hour."

Speaking generally, the PB teaching respecting S. is marked by its intensely practical character and its deep sense of

5. Summary. human need and peril. While there is little of formal doctrine or of the classification of sins or of any regular system of penance, the most remarkable emphasis is everywhere laid on the reality of the Christian battle against sin. This atmosphere of humility and penitence, profoundly Scriptural and Catholic, was deepened by the changes made at the Reformation. It constitutes one of the most evangelical features of the PB. It helps to make the PB suitable for private devotion as well as for public worship. This penitential tone of the PB seems to be specially valuable at a time when the Christian doctrine of S. is treated lightly or even derided; and when the need of penitence, not only for the heathen or open sinner but for the advancing Christian, calls for greater emphasis than it usually receives in popular theology and religion.

SINECURE.—A sinecure is, as the term—sine cura—implies, a parochial benefice, the rector of which is an eccles. person who, while he takes a certain part of the endowments, is free from the discharge of any spiritual duties, these being performed by a vicar. Both the rector and the vicar were instituted, unless the rectory was a DONATIVE, the patronage of the S. rector being vested in some patron, and that of the vicar in the S. rector. Ss. originated in a rector desiring to enjoy the fruits of the benefice without discharging the duties, and then obtaining leave to constitute a vicar who should be presented by him to the Bp., and be instituted by him. This proceeding was a grave abuse. It has, however, now nearly come to an end, very few Ss. now remaining, as by the provisions of the Statute 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 113, all sinecure rectories in public patronage were suppressed and the fruits were vested in the Eccles. Commissioners for their general purposes, with power to augment, if necessary, the endowment of the vicarages. Power was also given to the Commissioners to purchase the advowsons of Ss. in private patronage and then to suppress them.—ra.

SINGING.—From the earliest services in the Jewish Temple of which we have any record to those in the Ch. of the present day, music has always proved an important feature of religious worship. It is difficult to trace the actual

1. Introductory. time at which any sort of harmonised music was introduced, but it is clear that the first attempt to harmonise a melody was merely by placing the same melody a 4th, 5th or 8th above or below, a progression not only crude in the extreme, but entirely forbidden by modern laws of Harmony. About the end of the 11th cent. a great step forward was made, for notes of various value were introduced into the accompanying part. This practice, known as Descant, opened out vast possibilities, but unfortunately led later on to the introduction of music of a florid and secular type. It was not until the middle of the 16th cent. that John Merbecke was commissioned by Cranmer to write a setting of the Communion Service which should contain only one note to each syllable, as a protest against this kind of music. In this his name became immortalised as a Church musician, for this Service is worthily loved and admired by every one at the present day.

Nothing can be more uplifting than a service well rendered by a fine cathedral choir with its beautiful surroundings, whilst few things can be more distressing than a badly rendered service with the many faults, alas! only too common, viz., the straining of badly produced voices, the constant flattening of pitch, and the unsteady time and faulty rhythm; and, when simple means of avoiding these faults are within reach, it seems almost culpable neglect that they should continue, either through ignorance, or the indifference of those who are responsible.

It may be said that we cannot look for anything approaching the standard of a cathedral choir under ordinary circumstances.

2. Head and Chest Voice. for the voices are selected, and beautiful voices are always to be found in these choirs. Singing voices vary as much as speaking voices, and it is a pleasure to hear some people speak because of the natural musical tone, while it is a discomfort to listen to others. There are probably few subjects in which there is more diversity of opinion than that of voice production. The student is embarrassed and perplexed by being told he has three or four "Registers" to control, and much mystery is often made of breathing. There is, however, no need to trouble with the thought of more than two registers, and the management of these is a simple matter. Every one possesses what may be called two voices, the chest voice, and the head voice (not falsetto): in other words, a lower and an upper register respectively. It must of course be understood that these terms are purely figurative, and that the voice emanates from the larynx. The lower division, or chest voice, is accompanied by a sense of vibration in the chest, and by the feeling that the tone emanates from thence, while the upper division, or head voice, appears to proceed from the head, and the vibration is felt there and not in the chest.

A simple example will illustrate this in the boy's voice, or in the changed voice of the man. Sound this note to the syllable la with the mouth wide open, and notice the sense of fulness in the chest. Then sound the octave above by humming the note with the lips closed, and glide into the vowel oo, thus em-oo, and notice that the vibration seems entirely confined to the head, and not to the chest at all. The first note is produced by the so-called chest voice, while the other, the 8th above, is produced by the head voice.

Now that these registers or divisions are recognised, it may be explained that in almost all cases the bad production or straining is brought about by forcing the lower voice upwards. The pitch in this way can be raised only by increased tension, and the fatigue resulting from this is no doubt frequently the cause of flat S. Moreover, the undue strain put upon the larynx by forcing the low register upwards must result in time in the partial, or even entire, loss of voice.

In all musical instruments there is not only the sound generator, but an accessory, or resonator, of some sort. For instance, in the reed stop of the organ, the reed itself sounds the note, but the tube into which it speaks moulds or, in other words, forms the quality of tone, and it cannot be too clearly recognised that the mouth is the human resonator, and should be shaped for that purpose. In choirs where the tone is coarse and vulgar, it is nearly always through the boys learning and practising the music to the syllable la, whereas, by using the closed vowel of oo, the upper register or division of the voice will be brought down throughout the entire compass, and all straining and fatigue will be avoided. In the use of this vowel (oo) care must be taken that the mouth is not too much closed. Let it first be opened widely, as for ah, and then without closing it more than is really necessary, pronounce the word "You," and preserve this position when vocalising the vowel oo. Downward intervals from high to low notes, such as—should be practised thus a number of times; and finally upward intervals, taking care that the upper notes are always slightly louder than the low ones.

It is argued by many that the frequent use of this vowel is conducive to an indistinct articulation, and that pure vowels should be employed.

4. Vocalisation. In S., too much attention to the purity of the vowel is very apt to misplace the voice and destroy the quality of tone, and it should therefore be blended with the vowel which produces the best tone. It must be conceded that it is often impossible (according to the nature of the music) to pronounce the words as clearly in singing as in speaking. It is always thought necessary, even at a ballad concert, to supply books of words, while no one ever thinks of supplying an audience with words of a lecture which is given, or of a paper which is to be read. There should, however, be no difficulty in following the words, and the practice on this closed vowel, oo, need not, with proper attention, in any way hinder this, although in some elaborate passages it is difficult to articulate clearly.

[It must be remembered that singers have, except when singing unaccompanied, to make their articulation clear against the inarticulate sounds of some instrument, and that the organ or harmonium, with its continuous sound and constant volume of vibrations, is particularly liable to drown the enunciation of the various vowels and consonants. Singers, therefore, need to be told, not only to vocalise clearly, but to exaggerate the consonants as compared with the pronunciation of a good reader, if their singing of words is to be edifying and intelligible.—G. H.]

and so on, with all vowels and their modifications as pronounced in the various words, taking care that the second vowel is no louder than the first, and that the position of the mouth is preserved.

Sight-singing is a branch of choir work which is often neglected, whereas the study of this, if only elementary, is not only a great help in learning new music, but a source of great interest to the singer. For the purpose of reading, the notes of the scale have their distinctive names: do, re, mi, fa, soh, la, le, do, and the origin of these is interesting.

Early in the 11th cent. a Benedictine monk, one Guido d'Arezzo, noticed that in a Hymn to St. John the Baptist, the melody was so constructed that each successive phrase began one degree higher, and adapted the syllable at the beginning of each line to the regular notes of the scale (then consisting of only six notes) as the basis of a new system of solmisation, changing them from scale to scale as each was used.

These syllables have been found excellent for vocalisation, and have never been superseded, but it must not be forgotten that the quality of tone is apt to vary with each one, and therefore the position of the mouth for pronouncing the first one, do, should be preserved throughout the entire scale as nearly as possible.

To those who have acquired, to a certain degree, a knowledge of sight-reading through the practice of playing upon an instrument, the sol-fa names would at first appear a hindrance rather than a help, and, where a difficulty is found in applying them to the notes of the staff, an excellent plan is to employ them with tunes which are already well known. The value of them as associated with certain intervals is demonstrated by the fact that children in the Elementary Schools would find it very difficult to sing the interval do-soh to the syllables do-fa, and so on with other intervals.

It is almost impossible to attain anything like perfection in sight-reading without the use of the sol-fa syllables on the tonal system, viz., by applying Do to the key note, and following up the change of key by a constant alteration of its position on the staff.

The necessary cultivation of the voice for intoning is often neglected. It may not be advisable, or even possible, for many of the clergy who are called upon to take their part in a choral service to find time for a thorough training of the voice, as this involves the frequent practice of blending the two registers as before mentioned. The compass, however, employed in intoning is limited, and in most cases may be confined entirely to the lower register, or chest voice, and this will greatly reduce the amount of attention required. There are many instances of those who are able to intone well, and have not been able to give attention to the cultivation of the upper register at all. There are also many instances of those who possess good voices, and who use them badly for the want of a few simple rules for the management of the lower register. The most common faults may be recognised in the flattening of pitch, in varying the quality of tone on the different words, and in making a diphthong into two vowels, e.g., "O-o Lord open thaa-oo ower lips," "I-e believe," "Ow-er Father," and so forth. It is not generally recognised that in English pronunciation oh and l are as much diphthongs as ou or oi, being sounded as oh-oo, a-ee (a as in bat). The best way to avoid these faults is to practise the scale of C downwards and upwards to the vowel, not of ah, but of aw, and then to connect it with all the other vowels modified as they are in the various words, preserving the same shape of the mouth in the second vowel as in the first, and taking care that the second is not louder than the first. The fault of splitting up the diphthong, as in "I-e believe," is caused by changing too quickly to the terminal vowel. This should be as short as possible, and attached as nearly as possible to the following word. And the same may be said of the single or double consonants which close a syllable, as in the example following. Choir masters may with advantage take trouble over this point with their singers.

The necessity for good intoning is felt more and more in these days of fully choral services, and a clergyman unable to intone well is often at a great disadvantage. There are many instances of a person being under the impression that he is entirely unmusical, because he is not at once able to sound a given note, and therefore gives up all attempt to intone. The truth is that very few people are so unmusical that they cannot learn, or entirely without musical ear. If it is possible to distinguish between one unmusical sound and another, such as the breaking of glass, or the slamming of a door, there is every reason to believe that it will be possible under a good guide to recognise the difference between one musical sound and another.¹

is a low note, and that such a note as is a high one. The student should then look away from the instrument, and be asked to name the notes, high or low, as given. They can then be brought closer together in a little daily practice, until they are an octave apart, and in a short time there will be no difficulty in recognising the difference between them. By this time a great deal of the difficulty will be removed. The note should be constantly repeated, and the student will be able to imitate the sound with the voice. The following exercise should be practised:

and then with the help of a musical person other exercises of a similar nature should follow. It is within the experience of experts that many cases of this kind have been successfully treated.

² The difference between unmusical and musical sounds is that in the former the vibrations are irregular, whilst in the latter they are regular.

The vicar of a parish should of course decide what type of service is best suited to his people, congregational or otherwise.

8. Types of Service.

It is too often the case where congregational music is in use, that different members insist on joining in everything by singing without the slightest consideration for others, and frequently more sensitive persons are put to the greatest consternation and annoyance, and may well feel as strongly as did John Wycliffe, the translator of the first English Bible, when he said of the choir that "Matins and Evensongs were ordained of sinful men to be sung with high crying to hinder men from the sense and understanding of that which was sung. For, when there are 40 or 50 in a choir, three or four proud and wanton rascals will so trick the most devout service that no man shall hear the sense, and all others will be dumb and look like fools."—q2.

J. E. VERNHAM.

SITTING.—To sit at any time during service in church is a posture which depends solely upon custom. Neither in the rubrics of the PB, nor in the canons of 1604 and 1640, is there any allusion whatever to sitting in church. In this matter we have an illustration of the saying, that "Omission to prescribe is not necessarily prohibition to use." It is both reasonable and convenient to receive instruction sitting, that is, in a posture of rest and ease. Thus, the congregation sit during Lessons, Epistle, and Sermon. An exception to this rule is made in regard to the Gospel at the Communion. John Buckeridge, Bp. of Rochester, in 1618, wrote: "In our liturgies we stand at the Creed and reading of the Gospel, and we sit at the reading of the Psalms and Chapters" (Serm. 46). The practice of S. during the recitation of the Psalms was prevalent in the seventeenth cent., for we find frequent inquiries in episcopal visitation articles of that period as to whether the people stood up for the Gloria Patri: the custom was evidently more than tolerated (see Lathbury, Hist. of B.C.P., 2nd ed., 164, 172, 173, 182; Bp. Jeremy Taylor, Works, ed. Eden, 5 239, 240). In recent years a foreign custom has been introduced in some churches of kneeling whilst the Epistle is in reading. This is not only at variance with both Pre-Reformation and Post-Reformation custom, and also practically universal custom, but by so doing greater outward reverence is paid to the Epistle than to the Gospel, for which latter we stand. Thus, the practice of kneeling for the Epistle, compared with that of standing for the Gospel, is an inversion of the relative importance of the Epistle and the Gospel, and the degree of reverence relatively due to these liturgical Scriptures. Dr. Bisse, adopting the words of two well-known mediæval writers (Rupert and Hugh of St. Victor, in Hittorpius, 1610, coll. 866, 1397, 1398), wrote in 1716, "All the congregation stand up at the reading of the Gospels, as being the word of the Master; whereas, at the reading of the Epistles, they are indulged the posture of sitting, as being the words of the servants" (The Beauty of Holiness, 7th ed., 1720, 4 140). For a full discussion of this point, see Staley, Studies in Ceremonial 4 77-98.—R2.

V. STALEY.

SOBERNESS.—The word is the English equivalent in the AV of two NT words, ὑπόβριος and σώφρων, the latter also being translated "temperate."

The former word, used 1 Tim. 3 11, Tit. 2 2, and in verbal form 1 Pet. 1 13, denotes either abstinence from strong drink altogether or from its immoderate use. The 16th and 17th cent. use of the word in English combines the two Greek equivalents. In the Cat. its use probably inclines to that of νηφάλιος; in the phrase "godly, righteous and sober lives" to that of σώφρων. The immoderate use of strong drink prevents that sober-mindedness which is free from inordinate passion of any kind (see TEMPERANCE).—K37.

F. S. GUY WARMAN.

SOCIAL LIFE.—The Ch. regards the essential relations and conditions of S. life as of Divine institution, having their origin in human nature itself as created by God. In the light, not only of God's Word, but of observation and experience, she recognises that man was not made to "be alone," but that in his natural constitution he is endowed with S. instincts. The view put forth by certain political theorists that humanity in its original state consisted of isolated units naturally at war with each other, that they gradually laid aside their mutual hostilities from motives of self-interest, and that our existing S. relations are thus only the result of an arbitrary compact having no higher authority than human convenience, finds no countenance in the teaching of the Ch. With St. Paul she declares that "the powers that be are ordained of God" (Rom. 13 1).

The S. instincts innate in man find their expression and exercise, first, on a limited scale, in the affinities of the family, afterwards, through natural evolution and development, in the wider range of civil and national life. The family, not the individual, is the unit of society. The family is the microcosm of the nation. And, as the nation is the ultimate expansion of the family, so does it exhibit on a larger scale those essential relations the germs of which are bound up in the narrower affinities of the family. Parenthood, sonship, brotherhood, etc., are the direct prototypes of legitimate authority, subordination, mutual fellowship, and dependence, conditions absolutely essential to the very existence of society. And as in the ideal family the members are mutually complementary, "fitly framed together," and in their diversity supplying the several functions which contribute to a complete whole, so, as by an inexorable natural law, for the full exercise of civil life the spirit of mutual sympathy and the harmonious co-operation of its several departments are indispensable conditions to S. welfare and progress.

This view of SL., as divinely appointed in its mutual relations of authority and obedience, help and dependence, is consistently maintained throughout the

2. The Church and Society. formularies of the Ch., in her selected passages of Holy Scripture, as well as in the Lit. and Colls. No office of authority, no rank lowly or exalted, no circumstance affecting the general welfare of the people is forgotten. The King and Queen, the High Court of Parliament, the Lords of the Council, the Magistrates, as well as the whole body of the people in their various "sorts and conditions," in their tribulation or their wealth, the sick, the afflicted and distressed, the weak-hearted and the fallen, the prisoners and captives, all have a place in the petitions of the Ch. And she remembers likewise those conditions essential to the preservation and security of life and the well-being of the community, the bestowal of the fruits of the earth after their kind, deliverance from sedition and violence, and the maintenance of peace and concord, so that men may lead "a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty."

In matters of government and administration, however, the Ch. confines herself to the general principles which touch the essential relations of society, without descending to particulars. As her Lord refused to interfere in the functions of the civil power, so does the Ch. refrain from prescribing any forms of civil government. Whether the State be a republic or a monarchy, she proclaims that loyal obedience to constituted authority and the rendering "to all their dues" are matters of religious obligation.

In the Service of HC esp., the Ch. declares the sacredness of S. relations, giving signal prominence to the Ten Comms., in which S. principles and duties are co-ordinated with the honour and worship of God Himself. We must observe, however, that the Comms. do not create or initiate these principles; rather do they authoritatively confirm and define that which God had already implanted in the moral sense of mankind. They assume the paternal relation, the archetype of all lawful authority, the maintenance of which is the condition of S. and national stability; they assume the sacredness of human life, the institution of marriage, the rightful possession of property, the administration of justice, the safeguarding of family life and of peaceful relations among members of the same community.

Thus the Ch. recognises the Divine element in S. and national life, and it is her earnest pr. and effort that the human elements may be brought into closest harmony with it. The Ch. nowise holds aloof from S. service. On the contrary, she is eager to render it; but in doing so she seeks to transform S. duties in the light of a higher relation, adding "an element of infinity to common things," and regarding herself as "an organ" divinely appointed for the cultivation and expression of the spiritual instincts of the community.

SOCINIANS.—Faustus Socinus of Siena (1539-1604) drew his opinions from papers left to him by his uncle Laelius, and taught these opinions in Poland. They are contained in the Racovian Catechism. The position of the Reformers was quite alien to him. Revelation came not to the sinner seeking pardon and peace, but was intended to convey the knowledge of salvation. Pardon is not the beginning but the end of the Christian course. Faith does not save, unless it produces obedience. Christ is mere man, but He was miraculously born; sealed His teaching by miracles, especially by His resurrection, and is our perfect example. Since His ascension He is to be adored as God. But His death was not propitiatory. Modern Unitarians retain on the whole the spirit of Socinus, but few of them hold all his opinions.—A1.

SOLEMN LEAGUE AND [COVENANT.—

The terms of this C. were drawn up by the General Assembly in Scotland at the request of the Westminster divines. The Westminster Assembly and the Parliament approved and adopted it, the members of both Houses signing it in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on Sept. 25, 1643. It consisted of a preamble and six articles pledging its signatories to support the "extirpation of Popery" and "Prelacy," and, practically, the establishment of Presbyterianism in England. Hundreds of loyal clergymen were ejected from their benefices for refusing to sign it.

SPOON.—The use of a S. among other altar utensils may probably be traced as far back as the 9th cent. In the East, the S. is used to convey the combined species of the Euch. to the mouths of communicants. This custom does not seem to have ever prevailed in the West, where, however, a S. has been, and is still sometimes used, to communicate persons unable to receive in any other way. A strainer in the form of a pierced S. is sometimes provided to remove any foreign substance that may fall into the Chalice; anciently, it was also used at the preparation of the Chalice at the Offertory, to secure the purity of the wine.

A golden S., almost the only relic of the original Regalia, was used at the coronation of the lat. and the present kings; the Holy Oil from the Ampulla was poured into it by the Dean of Westminster, and into this the archbishop dipped his thumb and anointed, with the sign of the cross, the head, breast, and hands of the king.—R3.

T. I. BALL.

STALLS.—Eusebius (c. 314) speaks (HE x. 4 44) of the "lofty Thrones, in honour of those who preside," and of "seats decently arranged in order" (church at Tyre). This is probably the first clear mention (in so many words) of the bishop's THRONE and the seats for Presbyters, arranged round the APSE, like those "stern ledges that sweep round the Altar of Torcello." SEDILIA are supposed to be survivals of these seats. In mediæval times the Bp. removed to a humbler position, and the clergy sat in S. on either side of the Choir and in Return S., though sometimes (Nantwich) the western S. were placed only at an obtuse angle. The dean, chancellor, treasurer, and precentor occupied the four end S., and were called "oculi chori." The use of the other S. varied in different cathedrals. The S. were divided by arms, and the hinged seat ("Misericord") was carved, often with much beauty and humour. They were frequently (though only occasionally in parish churches) su mounted by canopies. Much good ancient stallwork remains, worthy of exact imitation. Modern stallwork is generally unsatisfactory in comparison. (1) The wood is too thin; the old carpenters never spared timber; the ends were from 3 in. to 5 in. thick, and the rest in proportion. (2) The bookboards are too high; the old ones rarely exceeded 2 ft. 3 in. in height; no "kneelers" were required, and kneeling was easy; the furniture never dwarfed the chancel, as it often does now. (3) The space between the seat and bookboard is too narrow. These faults should be carefully avoided.—R5.

W. A. WICKHAM.

STANDARDS in nave or chancel for lighting purposes should be very carefully arranged (see FITTINGS, § 7). For the lighting of the Holy Table and Sacrament there were anciently employed two S., sometimes four, with candles, placed on the pavement near the altar-step to afford light for the reading of the service. They were of metal or wood. Those placed on either side of the coffin at funerals were usually of wood.—R5.

STATE HOLY-DAYS.—By the authority of a proclamation issued at the commencement of each reign—from that of K. Charles

1. Origin. II until that of Q. Victoria inclusive

—special Services were annexed to the PB for Nov. 5, Jan. 30, and May 29, to commemorate respectively (1) the Papists' Conspiracy or Gunpowder Plot, (2) the birth, and restoration to the throne, of K. Charles II after the Great Rebellion, and (3) the murder of K. Charles I. In the Calendar of the Book Annexed, the authoritative MS. copy of the PB, and also in the printed Sealed Books, these three events are commemorated in Red-Letter, without distinction from other Red-Letter days. These three commemorations remained in successive reprints of the Calendar of the PB until the year 1859, when they were omitted, without authority, by the printers of the PB. When the Book Annexed was signed by the members of the Houses of Convocation, Dec. 20, 1662, the Services for these three days were not included, because they were not then prepared; but, following the Form of Consecrating an archbishop or bishop, stands the note—"The Forms of Prayer for ye v. of November, ye xxx. of Januarie, and for ye xxix. of May, are to be printed at ye End of this Book."

This note also appears in the Sealed Books. Thus, in 1662, the provision of special Services for the State Holy-Days was prospective. On April 26, 1661, the Services for the three days were introduced and publicly read through and unanimously approved in Convocation (Cardwell, Synodalia 2 671). The authoritative orders for the religious observance of Nov. 5 are statute 3 James I, c. 1; Jan. 30, statute 12 Charles II, c. 30, confirmed by 13 Charles II, statute 1, c. 7; May 29, statute 12 Charles II, c. 14, confirmed by 13 Charles II, statute 1, c. 11 (Cardwell, Hist. of Confer. 383, note). But in none of these statutes was any direction given as to a Service appointed for the day, that appointment being left in each case to the King in Council under his royal supremacy. The several Services were considered and arranged, under the King's licence in the Convocation of 1662, as said above, and later were annexed to the PB in obedience to a royal mandate. (For this mandate, see ib.). A similar order has been issued at the commencement of each succeeding reign until that of Edward VII, when it was discontinued.

On Jan. 17, 1859, Q. Victoria cancelled the previous order, made on her accession, for the continuance of the three Services

2. Omission. in question, in consequence of addresses presented to the Crown by both Houses of Parliament; and a statute was passed repealing previous Acts of Parliament which enjoined the religious observance of Nov. 5, Jan. 30, and May 29. The omission of the State Services for these days from the PB has thus been effected since 1859, by Royal and Parliamentary authority, without consent of the Church as represented in Convocation. In this manner this partial authority has cancelled an order of the Book Annexed, which directs the three Forms for the three occasions "to be printed at the end of this Book"—the Book of Common Prayer. As this direction is part of the Statute Law of England, authorised conjointly by Convocation, Parliament, and Sovereign, the suppression of the three State Services is a violation of the compact between Church and Realm, as set forth in the Act of Uniformity which imposed the PB in 1662. On the disappearance of the three Services, the printers, without any authority whatever, took upon themselves to omit the three commemorations from the Calendar, which appeared in Red-Letter until 1859. Against this mutilation of the PB Churchmen have a right to protest. (For a full discussion of the subject see Staley, Liturgical Studies, Longmans, 6 66 ff.)—s. V. STALEY.

STATE PRAYERS.—In this article, under the designation "State Prayers," are included:

Prayers for (1) The Sovereign, at 1. Preliminary. MP and EP, same form; at HC, alternative forms; (2) The Royal Family, at MP and EP (the Sovereign is also prayed for in the preces at MP and EP; and in the Pr. for the Church at the HC; and in the Lit., where three petitions for the Sovereign and one for the Royal Family find place); (3) The Clergy and People, at MP and EP, same form.

The Pr. for the Sovereign, in its earliest form at present discovered, is contained in two books,

2. Prayer for the Sovereign in MP and EP. published by the King's printer, 1545, at the close of the reign of K. Henry VIII (Procter and Frere, New Hist. B.C.P. 398, where this early form is given.) In 1559 this Pr., revised and shortened, was placed at the end of the Lit.; in 1662 it was moved to its present position in the PB. It may be observed that, though this Pr. has been much admired for the solemn dignity of its opening clause, the title "King of kings," attributed to the Eternal Father, is given in

Rev. 17 14, 19 16, to the Son: accordingly, and more accurately, the original Pr. was addressed to the Second Person of the Trinity.

In the Amer. PB, a Pr. for the President of the U.S.A. and all in Civil Authority takes the place of the Pr. for the Sovereign; it incorporates the petitions of the latter.

Both the Collects for the King at HC were compiled for and printed in the First PB of K. Edw.

3. Collects for the Sovereign in HC. VI. Until 1662 one of the two Collects for the Sovereign was said after the Coll. of the day; in 1662 this order was inverted, probably as a matter of convenience to obviate turning back of leaves in the PB, or to preserve the connection of the Coll. of the day with the Ep. and Gospel. The present sequence is unsatisfactory. In the Scottish Liturgy of 1764 permission is given to substitute the second of the six last Colls. of the English Com. Service for the Coll. for the Sovereign. The Amer. PB, for obvious reasons, has no pr. for the Sovereign, the same Coll. as in the Scottish Liturgy occupying its place. The Irish PB permits the omission of both these prayers when the King has been prayed for in any Service used in sequence with the HC.

On the subject of the frequency of pr. for the Sovereign in Service, see Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, 2nd ed., xix ff., 218 ff.; Legg, in Some Principles and Services of B.C.P. 166 ff.

The Pr., for the Royal Family, approved if not actually composed by Abp. Whitgift (Cardwell, Hist. of Confer. 235), 4. Prayer for Royal Family. appeared in 1604, and was added at the close of the Lit. It was removed to its present position in MP and EP at the last revision, 1662. In 1604 the title was, "A Prayer for the Queen and Prince, and other the King and Queen's children." In the reign of K. Charles I a service for a Fast-day (1625) was issued, in which the expression "the Fountain of all goodness" was inserted, as appropriate to a king then without issue, displacing the former clause referring to "royal progeny." These last words were replaced in 1632, mention being made of Prince Charles and the Lady Mary; but in the next year the clause was removed, and the words previously used finally substituted. The inconvenience of altering this pr. in successive reigns was thus obviated for the future.

The Pr. for Clergy and People is found in the Gelasian Sacramentary:¹ before the Reformation it followed the Lit. An English

5. Prayer for Clergy and People. version has been in the Primer since the 14th cent. (see Maskell, Mon. Rit. 2 107). In the Amer.

PB this Pr. opens, "Almighty and everlasting God, from Whom cometh every good and perfect gift"—a decided improvement upon, "Who alone workest great marvels"—words patient of an unfortunate inference, and calculated to perplex and even mislead. (See Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, 2nd ed., p. 137.)—D3. V. STALEY.

STATIONS OF THE CROSS.—The word "station" (statio) originally denoted a fast, possibly because certain fasts were kept on fixed days, more probably because they were standing places, encampments from and in which we may ward off the attacks of evil. Then it came to refer to any church, oratory, font or sacred place where an ecclesiastical procession halted, especially to places where INDULGENCES were granted. The holy places in Jerusalem, of which the Franciscan order were the guardians, were S. of special solemnity and privilege. To those who visited them extra Indulgences were given. Pope Innocent XII extended these privileges by granting them to all Franciscans who made the Way of the Cross (via Crucis) at home. Pope Benedict XIII, in 1726, granted a share in these indulgences to all, whether Franciscans or no, and it thus became a common practice of the Roman Church. The method is to place the pictures in a church, and the worshipper passes from picture to picture, kneeling and praying at each. The pictures are: (1) Christ before Pilate; (2) Bearing the Cross; (3) His first Fall; (4) Meeting His Mother; (5) Simon of Cyrene; (6) Veronica; (7) His second Fall; (8) Speaking to the Women; (9) His third Fall; (10) The Stripping; (11) The Crucifixion; (12) The Death; (13) The Taking Down from the Cross; (14) The Burial. The devotion dates from Post-Reformation days, and has no place in the worship of the Church of England.—R4. F. S. GUY WARMAN.

STEPHEN, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 9; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 3.

STEPS.—The position and number of S varies with circumstances. Where there is a crypt, as at Canterbury, long flights of S. into the quire are necessary. But the use of an excessive number of S. for the purpose of displaying the altar is quite un-English. Mediæval altars and fonts were generally only moderately raised. English custom invariably placed a step, the Gradus Chori, just east of the quire stalls to mark the commencement of the sanctuary. Beyond this the altar was usually raised on three S., though there was no definite rule. The chancel, too, is usually a step or two above the nave, but often it was flush; at Bilton (Warwickshire) there is a step down into the chancel, and at Irchester (Northants.) the chancel was originally several S. below the nave. [Cp. RITUAL LAW, § 16, 4°, for 1561 R. Order about S.]—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

STOLE.—The S., also known as the Orarium, is a narrow scarf, from two to three inches in width and about nine feet long, embroidered at the extremities and generally having its edges fringed. It is worn over the alb by the celebrating priest at the HC, and over the surplice when the alb is not worn. The priest wears the S. round his neck, hanging down in front over each shoulder, the deacon upon the left shoulder only. In the Western Church it is the custom for the deacon to fasten or tie the S. under the right arm-pit; in the Greek Church the S. is simply worn over the left shoulder, with the ends hanging loose before and behind. It is difficult to ascertain when the S. first became a portion of ecclesiastical dress. The word is derived from the Latin stola, a dress or robe, and was applied to the dress of a Roman lady. Subsequently, it was adopted by the clergy as signifying the yoke of Christ.¹

When worn in conjunction with the other vestments at the HC, the S. is placed over the shoulders, crossed over the breast to the girdle, thence hanging loosely to the knees. It is usually made of silk, and is of the same colour as the chasuble, varying according to the festivals and seasons of the Church's year. The use of coloured Ss. in the Church of England has been pronounced by the Arches Court to be illegal, but the pronouncement has been ignored very generally [though never appealed against]. The present practice of wearing a coloured S. for MP or EP is without sanction and contrary to ancient custom, the black scarf being undoubtedly more correct. The coloured S. however is by custom worn at baptisms, marriages, at the burial of the dead, and frequently in preaching.—R3.

J. O. COOP.

STOUP.—Stoup is the name given to a small stone basin formed in the inner wall of a ch., near the entrance, for the purpose of holding Holy Water, sometimes a separate vessel is employed instead. Though the use of Holy Water was abandoned in Eng. at the Reformation, many ancient Ss. still remain, in a more or less perfect condition, in our churches (see WATER, HOLY).—R5. J. W. TYRER.

STUDY.—At his ordination the priest promises to be "diligent . . . in reading of the Holy Scriptures and in such studies

1. Necessity. as help to the knowledge of the same." Those who are called to teach must themselves be students, and their studies must not cease when they take their degree or are ordained to the ministry. In the present day education of every kind is advancing. Many results of critical and historical inquiry, which would have seemed strange to our fathers, have been accepted as true. There is considerable unsettlement of religious belief. Laymen take a keen and intelligent interest in questions of sacred learning, and know of the eager controversies which are ever being waged round fundamental and vital truths of religious belief. Such men will only be attracted and held by a preacher who speaks with the authority which comes from adequate knowledge, and with the conviction which is based on ascertained fact. Learning is no substitute for spirituality nor comparable to it in importance, but, on the other hand, piety is not evinced by, or an excuse for, intellectual indolence. He only can properly teach who is continually learning. Christ's people must not be fed with mouldy bread or given water from a stagnant well. The ignorant man flounders miserably and his congregation knows it. If to ignorance is added verbal facility then his doom is sealed. When a clergyman fails to know the best that is being thought and written on religious subjects, he is not only a loser himself, but his people suffer, and the whole Church is the poorer. Freshness, variety and simplicity spring from fulness of digested knowledge. The aim is edification (Chrysostom, De Sacerdotio, bk. 4).

There are five principal subjects of Sacred Study.

(a) Holy Scripture. It is essential to gain some clear conception of the history of Israel and her neighbours, and to understand when and how, in relation to that history, the books of the OT came to be written. Isaiah 1-39, for instance, is only intelligible in view of the position of Jerusalem as a fortress commanding the great coast road between Egypt and Assyria. Similarly, in the NT the Acts and St. Paul's Eps. throw light on one another (Paley, Horae Paulinae), and St. John's writings gain in meaning as their date and relation to the earlier gospels are realised.

The doctrine of Inspiration should be built up from a study of the Bible itself rather than applied as a ready-made theory to which the books are to be expected to conform. The study of Holy Scripture should be directed towards attaining an ever clearer grasp of the revealed knowledge of God in its practical significance for man. (See Westcott, Lessons from Work, p. 127, for methods of Bible study.)

The following works will be found useful: Hastings, Dict. of the Bible, 5 vols.; one vol. Bible Commentary, low in price and containing much; G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 15s., most valuable; Kent, Student's Bible, to be completed in six vols.; Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the OT; For N.T. cp. Moffatt (advanced) and Zahn (conservative); Bennett and Adeney's Bible Introduction, 7s. 6d., gives the views of leading critics; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, and Geikie's Life of Christ, for a picture of the time.

Among commentators, G. A. Smith, Westcott, and Lightfoot stand out. The best series are the International Critical and Westminster Commentaries. Also (cheaper) Cambridge Bible and Greek Test. (recent vols.) and Century Bible.

(b) Ecclesiastical History. The original sources should be studied where they are accessible, like Eusebius, Bede, Adamnan, Sulpicius Severus, in preference to histories by modern writers. (Bp. Collins, The Study of Ecclesiastical History, 2s. 6d.)

(c) Patristics. It is better to read some short writing by the ancient father himself than a great deal about him; as, for instance, St. Ignatius's Epistles, the De Incarnatione of Athanasius, Augustine's Confessions, and Origen's Philocalia. A little first-hand knowledge is of more value than much second-hand information. (Prof. Swete, Patristic Study, 2s. 6d.)

(d) Christian Doctrine, including Liturgyology. In Christian doctrine the growing knowledge of God and of the means of fellowship with Him, based on the facts of the Incarnation, finds historical expression. The history of worship shows how the Christian verities have passed into the language of prayer and adoration and met the needs of the human heart and will. Each formula is now, or once has been, living experience. When that aspect is sympathetically realised, each stage in the development becomes luminous and interesting. "Theology . . . is in its essence the most progressive of all sciences for it advances with the accumulated movement of all" (Westcott, Lessons from Work, p. 63).

(e) Apologetics. It is necessary to know what objections are urged against the Faith, and what difficulties are felt, in order to be clear of the dishonesty of misleading or doubtful statements, and to avoid the weakness which results from clinging to untenable positions. The best method of apologia, however, is not one of mere defence, but the positive manifestation in word and life of the power and peace of a victorious and convincing faith. (Westcott, Gospel of Life, 6s.)

People often complain that they have "no time" for S., but they have all the time there is. If time cannot be found for reading without neglecting other duties, then some other duties must be neglected. Much, however, may be done by guarding against any careless waste of time and by more perfect system. Absolute regularity is of more importance than the amount done on one occasion. No day should pass without some careful S. Perseverance must be as a flame which invincibly springs up again when the obstacle is removed. It is a good plan to make notes on loose cards, which can be carried in a pocket-book, and afterwards carefully and systematically filed. These notes should be made the basis of connected and directed thought during walks or drives. Such brooding over a subject is most fruitful. It is better to read little and remember much than to read much and remember little. The great use of reading is to stimulate the mind and supply food for thought. The mere student verily has his reward, but blessed is he to whom vision is also given. To know is much, to see is more.

At daily service the NT lesson may in many cases be read in Greek and the OT in the Vulgate, Septuagint or Hebrew. It is an excellent thing to form the habit of reading the daily P.s. in the original. This practice is especially valuable if an unpunctuated text like that of Wellhausen is used. Knowledge of the language is thus kept fairly fresh, even if no more Hebrew is read during the remainder of the day.

It is easier to be regular and it is more profitable to work in conjunction with small groups of other men than alone. Advantage should be taken of such organisations as the Central Society for sacred S., or the various Church History Societies. Work should have some definite aim and intended outcome, but this should not be of too immediate a kind. Preparation may be made for delivering a course of lectures, or for writing a paper, or article, or book, which would sum up the work of months or years. The examination for the B.D. degree directs S. and tests knowledge, and imposes a continuous and most valuable discipline on those who enter for it. The plan of studying simply with a view to the next sermon is bad. It is better to prepare oneself carefully and to let the sermon be the outcome of living thought and true personality than merely to read for the occasion. Nitrates may be used to fertilise the soil and enable it to put forth its own blossoms, but it is not good to pluck another man's flowers. The circle of intellectual interest should be kept wide, but each clergyman should have some subject which he makes especially his own through the noisy years, as, for instance, the Johannine writings, Isaiah, Origen, or Dante.

(a) Read with pencil or stylograph in hand. Mark what is important. Make a short analysis or note at the top of the page. This plan helps to keep the attention fixed. It aids the memory. It makes it easy to review the book and revive impressions in subsequent years. This practice is not recommended when the book belongs to a friend. (b) The results of S. should always be committed to writing and the record kept. It is better to do this after closing the books than to copy out passages. Knowledge is assimilated and becomes a permanent possession when the mind is called on to reproduce it afresh. Scenes which a painter has sketched remain indelibly imprinted on his memory, while the remembrance of those at which he has merely attentively gazed in time fades away. What is only read or copied may pass over or out of the mind. What the mind fuses and recasts is never quite forgotten. (c) Keep a commonplace book and have a growing series of large uniform note-books with numbered pages. Let them be easily accessible. Always use these books (if the card system is not employed) for the rough notes made in preparation for each sermon, address, speech or lecture, or in the S. of any subject. Notes required for immediate use can easily be copied on loose sheets. The books should be carefully kept, and in this way, as the years pass, a quantity of useful material is gradually stored up without extra labour and much time is saved. (d) Have a strongly bound index book sufficiently ample to serve a lifetime. Enter in it at the time, with cross-references when necessary, the title of every subject on which notes have been made, with such record of the particular note-book and page as will make reference easy and certain. The value of such an index-book increases each year. (e) Keep a table with the books being studied lying always ready for use. (f) Make the most of odd minutes in tramcars or even on door-steps. A working knowledge of a modern language can be gained in a few months by five minutes' practice several times a day. (g) Remember that there is no subject which cannot be learnt by returning to it again and again and that it is not too late to begin.

8. Practical Hint.

Rogo Te, Veritas, Deus meus, ut quaecunque salubriter scienda doceas me; in his quae vera novi custodias me; in quibus ut homo fallor, corrigas me; in quibus veris titubare confirmes me; et a falsis ac noxiis eripias me. Amen.—re, v.

[The need for well-furnished libraries accessible to the clergy is usefully illustrated by the following quotations. The R. Injns. for cathedrals in 1549 (VAI 2 136) provided that the chapter "shall make a library in some convenient place within their ch., within the space of one year next ensuing this visitation, and shall lay in the same St. Augustine's, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Cyprian, Theophylact, Erasmus, and other good writers' works." Every Tues. and Fr. there was to be a lecture of the Holy Scriptures at Windsor in 1550. Abp. Holgate at York, in 1552, ordered (VAI 2 319) that "the ancient writers of the Ch. (those we call ancient that did write within 600 years after Christ's Ascension), Musculus' Commentaries upon Matt. and John Brentius upon Luke, Calvin and Bullinger upon the Epistles, Erasmus' Annotations on the NT, be provided in the Library.—G. SUBDEACON.—An order formed by devolution from the diaconate. It had its origin probably at Rome, where the number of deacons was limited to seven. In the early part of the 3rd cent. Ss. are mentioned in the letter of Cornelius to Fabius (Euseb., HE vi. 43), and the title occurs several times in the works of Cyprian. In the East the first writer to mention them is Athanasius. They prepared the vessels and the sanctuary, and kept order at the doors and among the people, but were not allowed to minister as deacons at the altar. The term is now used to signify the third ordained minister (whether priest or deacon) who takes part at a solemn celebration of the Euch. See MINOR ORDERS and the literature referred to there.—A3.

SUBSCRIPTION (CLERICAL).—See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, § 6; CANONS OF 1604, § 7; DOCTRINE.

SUCCENTOR.—Deputy of the PRECENTOR; permanently, where, as in some cathedrals, the precentor is a dignitary. It differs from sub-chanter, the name given to the lay-clerk or vicar-choral who (as at Lichfield) chants the Litany with officiating minor canon.—qr. JAMES BADEN POWELL.

SUFFRAGAN.—(1) The remaining diocesan bps. in a province under a metropolitan are called his Ss., because summoned by him to give their suffrages in synod. (2) The term is also employed in the Act 26 Henry 8, c. 14, to denote an order of assistant bps., who take a territorial title, but whose authority is limited in range and duration by the commission of the bp. of the diocese. The Act provides that the bp. shall present two names to the King, who shall allow of one of them, and issue a mandate for his consecration. The title does not lapse on the vacancy of the see, but a new commission is necessary. The list of 25 places named in the Act as furnishing titles has since been enlarged considerably, and most dioceses have one or more S. bps. But the expedient is not considered satisfactory as all the more responsible parts of the work must still be performed by the DIOCESAN BISHOP. The division of the DIOCESE into two or more new sees is generally regarded as the only satisfactory solution of the difficulty of unwieldy dioceses which no single bp. can effectively supervise.—T3. G. HARFORD.

SUFFRAGE.—The right to vote in an election: see FRANCHISE and POLL. Elections are usually of representatives: see CHURCHWARDEN, PROCTOR, etc. In some very exceptional cases an incumbent is elected by the parishioners.—A2.

R. J. WHITWELL.

SUICIDE.—The first Rubric at the head of the Burial Service runs as follows: "Here is to be noted, that the Office ensuing is not to be used for any that die unbaptised, or excommunicate, or have laid violent hands upon themselves." Christianity has always regarded a S. as excommunicate, in that he deliberately destroys that life which God has given him to cherish, and which Christ came to redeem. The alarming increase in Ss. of recent years is due to a diminishing religious sensitiveness—also largely to the jury's frequent verdict of "while of unsound mind," which entitles the relatives of the S. to claim Christian burial for him. The Rubric in the PB obviously did not contemplate that large numbers of those who "lay violent hands upon themselves" would be classed as insane, or the wording would in all probability have been different. The abhorrence of the Church for the S. was shared by the State, and it was customary to bury Ss. at cross roads with a stake through their bodies. This refusal of Christian burial must have had a deterrent effect where Christianity was a vital force. It is found that, where religious belief is definite and its personal hold upon the people is strong, there is less incentive to self-destruction. The clear teaching given in the PB, if carefully imparted, would do much to reduce the number of suicides.—K3⁶. F. L. H. MILLARD.

SUNDAY.—The First Day of the Week, the Lord's Day (tropically, "the Christian Sabbath").

1. Introductory. (A.S. Sunnan-dæg; Old Eng. Sonnen-day; Germ., Sonn-tag; from A.S. Sunne = Sonne, the Sun, and Dæg = Tag, Day. Latin Solis Dies, Dies Solennis, Dies Dominica Fr. Dimanche; Ital. Domenica; Portug. Domingo; in Russian known as The Day of Resurrection, or simply Resurrection.) [For the liturgical and antiquarian aspects of Sunday, see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 1, 2.]

(a) Scriptural Synonyms. The name "Sunday" does not occur in Holy Scripture. In the NT, "the first day of the week" (ἡ μὲν τῶν ἑβδομάτων) receives frequent mention; in the Gospels, as the day upon which Christ rose from the dead; and, in the later books (Acts 20 7, 1 Cor. 16 1, 2), it is associated with what had already become the customary weekly assembling of the disciples for worship and almsgiving. Thus definitely commemorating the transcendent truth of their Lord's Resurrection, Christians instinctively regarded it as "the Lord's Day," ἡ Κυριακή ἡμέρα, which title is constantly given to it in the early literature of the Church. But this designation occurs only once in the NT, in a passage (Rev. 1 10) where its application to the Weekly Festival of the Resurrection is not indisputably clear, though accepted with practical unanimity by the Ch. in every age.

(b) Mythological Origin of the Name. "Sunday" was the name given by the Teutonic nations to the first of the seven days of the hebdomadal periods ("weeks"), representing, approximately, the quarter of a lunar month, into which they divided time. Each of the seven days received the name of one of their Divinities, a position of primacy being thus acquired by the day that was dedicated to the Sun as the source of light and life—the day being similarly known to pre-Christian classical writers as ἡ τοῦ Ἡλίου ἡμέρα, the venerabilis Dies Solis of pagan antiquity.

(c) The name "Sun Day" in early Christian usage. The name thus associated in the minds of the heathen with the "Sunshine" of the natural universe was recognised at a very early period by the Christian instinct of the Church as capable of ready adaptation to the weekly festival of their Lord's Resurrection, a day which commemorated the triumph of Christ, "the Light of the World," the true "Life" of men, over the darkness of sin and death; and the name "Sunday," with its store of symbolism, was thus appropriated to the "first day of the week" by the Patristic and other writers of the first three centuries. The name is, tropically, transferred by Justin Martyr to the "first day" of Creation, "the day called 'Sun Day,' that being the day . . . in which God dispelled the darkness, . . . and on which Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead" (I Apol.

67). So, too, S. is described as "the eighth day," and its figurative symbolism in connection with the Resurrection is emphasised by Barnabas, A.D. 100 (c. 15), and Cyprian, A.D. 250 (Ep. 64 4).

(d) The Sabbath and Sunday. Just as the symbolism of the Dies Solis was, figuratively, transferred to the Christian vocabulary, and consecrated to Christian purposes by being appropriated to the Weekly Festival of the Risen and Ascended Christ, so, too, the analogies suggested by the primeval rest day, and, even more obviously, by the Mosaic Sabbath, were, in the early teaching of the Church, constantly interpreted as, figuratively, applicable to the weekly commemoration of the Resurrection of Him who alone can give true "rest unto the souls" of men.

The fundamental distinction between the seventh day "Sabbath" of Judaism and the Christian S. was so well known to the early Christians that the allusion of patristic writers to the spiritual and mystical affinity between the two institutions could never have been understood to imply that the legal and ceremonial obligations and restrictions of the Sabbath were, literally, to be observed by Christians, or transferred to their joyous weekly commemoration of their Lord's Resurrection.

Up to the time of the destruction of the Temple, the Jewish converts to Christianity continued to observe both institutions, on two successive days; and early Christian literature abounds with warnings against the peril of confusing the conventional "observance" of the Mosaic "Sabbath" as prescribed by Rabbinical tradition (the abuse of which was so unceasingly denounced by "the Lord of the Sabbath" Himself), with the ennobling inspirations and the spiritual liberties attaching to the Christian Sunday.

The later history of the Church proves that the peril of an unguarded employment of the "Sabbath" as a name that may be properly substituted for that of "Sunday" or "the Lord's Day" is a very real one. The controversies which, through sixteen centuries, have been occasioned by "Dominican" or "Sabbatarian" theories upon Sunday observance illustrate the wisdom and happiness of the Ch. of Eng. in the nomenclature adopted by the PB, in which the first day of the week is, from first to last, exclusively described under the name of Sunday.¹

The suggested alteration of Sunday to the Lord's Day in the Revision of 1662, proposed at the Savoy Conference, was considered unnecessary. No attempt seems ever to have been made to secure the Church's imprimatur upon the substitution of Sabbath for either of the two alternative names.

The reticence of the PB as to the time when and the circumstances in which the first day of

2. Origin and Authority. the week became invested as the Lord's Day with its unique pre-eminence, and recognised as an institution of paramount importance in the life and worship of the Christian Church, is in full accord with the silence of the NT and of the earliest patristic and liturgical writings of primitive Christendom on these points.

Neither in the Bible or the PB is any formal warranty given to the traditional belief that the observance of S. was either (i) enjoined by Christ Himself as a part of His teaching during the Forty Days preceding His Ascension, or (ii) expressly enacted by the Apostles, under the direct inspiration of the Holy Spirit, on the Day of Pentecost, the seventh S. after the Lord's Resurrection. With respect to these conjectures—however reasonable, or however strongly supported by ancient and pious tradition—the PB offers no pronouncement.

By assuming the origin and authority of S. to need no sort of formal explanation, the Liturgy affords strong ground for the presumption that the observance of the day was believed by the Apostolic Church to have received the sanction and approval of the Risen Christ Himself. This belief may well go back to the fact that the Lord had Himself selected, even from the octave of the Resurrection, the first day of the week as the occasion upon which He had vouchsafed to manifest His Personal Presence to His Disciples.

That this recognition of S. as an Ordinance claiming, certainly, Apostolic—and, by implication, Divine—authority, is everywhere assumed, though nowhere formally proclaimed, in the English Liturgy, is apparent: (i) from even the most cursory survey of the structure and composition of the Book itself; and, still more, (ii) from a careful study of what may be called the "soul" of the Liturgy—its spiritual and devotional ideals.

(i) The all-pervading influence of the first Christian S. is proclaimed by the central position which Easter occupies in the ecclesiastical Calendar, and is attested by the announcement prefixed to its "Tables and Rules" for ascertaining the "Sunday Letter," for computing the recurrence of Easter, and for fixing the Church's "Movable Feasts and Holy-days," that, in regard to these, it is "Easter Day, on which the rest depend."

Thus the influence of the Dies Dominica at once regulates and co-ordinates the entire cycle of the Christian Seasons, and is itself a striking proof that it is, in reality, none else than the Risen "Lord of the Sabbath" Whose Divine Glory, as the central Sun, illuminates the Dial Plate upon which His waiting Church records, on each successive S. of the year, her "due observance" of its gracious influence.

(ii) Still more profound is the impression left by S. upon the inner life of the PB—upon the "motif" and devotional intention of its entire Liturgical system.

This is evident from the Lectonary, with its special Lessons for every S. morning and evening of the year, and Proper Psalms for Easter and Whit-Sunday, the Church thus emphasising the duty of "hearing" and "receiving" the Word of God as a primary part of the observance of S., and at the same time making provision for a complete presentation of "the Faith of the Gospel" to all who avail themselves of the opportunity which S. affords for systematic instruction in the fulness of the Doctrine and Discipline of Christ.

By appointing special Collects, Epistles and Gospels for every S., together with a "Sermon or Homily" appropriate for each, the PB plainly assumes that no First Day of the week should ever pass (a) without due Celebration of "those Holy Mysteries" which the "Lord of the Sabbath" had Himself instituted, and which, from the days of the Apostles, had been regarded as distinctively appropriate to the Lord's Day; and (b) without discharging the debt of love we owe to our neighbour, by taking our share in the duty, not less plainly enjoined by apostolic example and usage as a special part of S. observance, of contributing alms for the sick and needy or other charitable purposes.

It may be noted, also, that the ministration of the Sacrament of Baptism both in the case of Infants and Adults is, in the Rubrics, declared to be of such dignity as to require that it should be celebrated only, wherever possible, on "Sundays and other Holy-Days."

Lastly, it is impossible to overlook the fact, so closely associated with the subject we are considering, that the Fourth Commandment—as an integral portion of the Decalogue—occupies an important position in the PB. This fact indeed claims, at this point, special consideration.

The Ten Commandments stand, as it were, on guard, at the very portals both of the Catechetical and the Sacramental teaching of the PB.

Prominent among these stands the positive command to "remember" the "Sabbath Day," and to "keep it holy"—in conspicuous contrast with the prohibitions of all others but the 5th. Obedience to the Ten Commandments is required as a condition of admission to the privileges of Baptism, of Confirmation, and of those "Holy Mysteries" of "the Body and Blood of Christ," of which he who would be a "worthy partaker" must "first try" and "examine his life and conversation by the rule" of those Ten Words of God; and he is charged, in approaching "the banquet of that most heavenly Food," to pray that God will "incline his heart to keep all these, His laws."

On the other hand, that the obligation is of a moral and spiritual character is obvious, not merely from the express language of Art. 7, but from the implicit teaching of the PB as a whole. In regard to the 4th Commandment, this moral obligation is implied by the total silence of the Cat., in its explanation of the Decalogue, as to the Jewish Sabbath, except so far as that we are there reminded that one essential part of our duty to God is "to serve Him truly all the days of our life." Further, by allowing the seventh-day Sabbath, with its ceremonial observances, to pass entirely out of its liturgical system and out of the Christian Calendar, while at the same time surrounding the "first day of the week" with not less, if not more, sacred regard than had, under the old dispensation,

4. Position and Influence.

5. Sunday and the 4th Commandment.

attached to the Sabbath, Art. 7 undeniably suggests that "though the Law (e.g., of the Sabbath) given from God by Moses, as touching Ceremonies and Rites, do not bind Christian men," yet the moral principles that underlie that Law are of perpetual obligation, and that these principles find their true expression and their true fulfilment in the Christian Sunday.

Above all, by incorporating Christ's own summary of the Decalogue (Matt. 22 36-40, cp. 7 12, etc.) in the form and substance of its practical Teaching, the PB clearly proclaims that it is to "the Lord of the Sabbath" Himself—and not to any code of conventional rules—that the Christian must refer, in his search for guidance as to the due observance of Sunday.

The position of supremacy given by the PB—alike in its liturgical structure and in its doctrinal and devotional standards—to S. is of itself a conclusive indication of the sufficiency of the Law of Christ, His "Golden Rule" of the Love we owe to God and to our Neighbour, as furnishing the master-key to any of our present-day perplexities respecting the "due observance" of Sunday. The teaching of the Liturgy is, however, significantly silent as to the details of S. observance; and leaves to individuals, in this respect, the "liberty with which Christ has made them free."

But the following practical principles seem to be clearly suggested by that moral obligation of the Sabbath Law which the PB undeniably affirms, and to which Our Lord Himself, by His example of personal obedience to the higher obligations of that Law, while consistently denouncing its Rabbinical perversions, seems to lend the sanction of His implicit approval.

(1) The principle of the sabbatical Consecration of our Time finds in the Weekly festival of the Resurrection its highest and most complete expression. The Christian S. "hallows" "all the days" of the Christian Life. The separation of a "stated" proportion of Time—one day in seven—is not only consistent with the recognition of God's Claim upon the whole life of man, it is the open confession of that claim.

(2) The punctual recurrence of S. once in each week, in the life of every one, witnesses to the importance attaching to it as a never-failing Memorial of Man's Duty to God. The peril of forgetfulness of God—the tendency to overlook the Divine Hand, as controlling the history of the Nation, the Home, the Individual—this is a peril to which an age of great material progress, and a highly organised civilisation, with all its artificial refinements and luxury, are especially prone. Against this, S.—attesting afresh the perpetual obligation of the positive command, "Remember"—offers a priceless and effective safeguard.

(3) The principle of Worship, as a duty binding upon each individual Christian, is obviously implied in the Christian Law of Love to God, as applied to the Fourth Commandment. What is more liable to be overlooked is that, in order to provide a due opportunity for the "assembling together" of Christians for collective worship, the observance of S. must be recognised as one of paramount obligation by individual Christians.

(4) Equally conspicuous is the seal that S. places upon the Law of Work, and upon the rights of Labour, as enjoined by the Christian Law of Love to our Neighbour, when applied to the Fourth Commandment. It reaffirms the Divine principle of the sabbatical suspension of servile or purely mercenary—and thus needless and unjustifiable—toil, and proclaims the world-wide application, as the true standard of industrial and commercial efficiency, of God's unalterable "time-limit"—"six days"—and six only out of every seven—"shalt thou labour."

This is a principle which the latest conclusions of biological, medical, and physiological science amply corroborate; and it is found to carry with it a limitation of the highest practical value in regard to the economical distribution of Labour, by furnishing a simple—and therefore little regarded—but none the less sound and effective, contribution to the solution of the unemployment problem.¹

S. thus bears witness against the sin of idleness, and, while proclaiming the positive Duty of Work, it removes from human toil any degrading association, by reminding the humblest toiler of the fact that, among the purposes of the Holy Incarnation, none was more conspicuous than the Consecration of Labour by the Workshop at Nazareth.

(5) In no other respect are the analogies between the Lord's Day and the Sabbath more obvious than in connection with the Law of "Rest," or Re-creation. The Festival of the Lord's Resurrection, as commemorated in what may in this connection be termed "the Christian Sabbath," implies, necessarily, neither cessation of work, nor mere vacant physical, mental, or spiritual idleness. Work that is hallowed by unselfish and unmercenary motive—work inspired by the "Golden Law" of Love to God and to our Neighbour—is in the nature of that "service" which, in whatever form of consecrated activity, is fully consistent with the due observance of S. which the "Lord of the Sabbath" approved.

Prior to Constantine's Edict (A.D. 321), prohibiting toil in urban districts, Christians enjoyed no systematic remission of their usual occupations on Sunday.

¹ A single illustration of the fact here referred to may be cited. By the granting of a Weekly Rest Day to the Metropolitan Police in 1909, the immediate result has been that, in order to set the 19,000 members of the Metropolitan Constabulary free for the enjoyment of a "sabbatical" respite from duty, it has been necessary to offer employment in the Force to about 1,400 "new" men, thus ultimately providing regular occupation to a corresponding number of those who had been hitherto "unemployed" owing to the fact that the London Police had been working under conditions which entirely ignored the Divine "overtime limit"—"Six days shalt thou labour."

The "rest" enjoined by the sabbatical principle in the Christian regulation of man's labour means the re-creation—the renewal—of his entire life. Thus S. stands as a perpetual protest against the folly, and the sin, of seeking rest ("and finding none") apart from Him Who alone can quench the fever of the human soul, that must be "restless for ever, till it rests in God." "Rest apart from God," it has well been said by Canon Newbolt, "has become only another form of oppressive labour. The toil-some 'holidays' in which recreation is pursued, with hard toil, to the ruin of happiness, are but another indication of the restlessness which overtakes a heart which has forgotten God." This is the true peril of the "Week-end habit" which has done so much to de-christianise our English S., and which is so characteristic a by-product of our 20th cent. "unrest."

Applying the "Golden Rule" of Christ to the subject of Recreation, in connection with the

12. No Rules but the Golden Rule. Christian's Duty to God and to his fellow-men, it may be conceded that, within the large limits of the Christian "Law of liberty," no hard and fast rules, applicable to all persons and to all circumstances alike, as to what occupations, employments, recreations, or amusements, may be permissible or lawful, can possibly be laid down.

Many things in this connection may indeed be "lawful," but they may be very far from "expedient"; and, if a man rules his S. observance by a conscientious regard for the Duty he owes to God and to his neighbour, he will need no other rule for his due observance of the Lord's Day.

(i) The Love he owes to God for his "creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life," and for his "redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ"—a due appreciation of "the means of grace"—this will at least secure his own habitual obedience to the duty of consecrating his life by claiming his personal share in the public worship and fellowship of the Church. For such a man, no "claim" of "amusement" or "recreation" will be considered as any justification for the neglect of any part of the duty he thus owes, as of primary and paramount obligation, as the first and true purpose of the Lord's Day. This Duty, inspired by its true motive of the Love of God, will not be regarded as fully accomplished by any bare minimum of S. worship.

Such a man will be at no pains to define the place which recreations, of an innocent kind, will occupy in the leisure hours of the Lord's Day. These, in so far as they are loyally subordinated to the higher purposes of S., may be truly consecrated to God's honour, as enabling him to return to the duties of the week with the faculties of body and mind re-invigorated and renewed. In regard to any such lawful and innocent means of re-creating his physical and mental powers, he may well claim the "liberty wherewith Christ" has "made him free." But, in all of them, and under all circumstances, he will "take heed, lest by any means this liberty" of his "become a stumbling-block to them that are weak" (1 Cor. 8 g).

(ii) Even more readily will the "Golden Rule" of the Lord of the Sabbath be found to lend itself to the solution of such questions as arise, in connection with the Christian interpretation of the sabbatical principle when applied to the claim of "our

13. Others' neighbour S. stands for in the life of Toil. Here, obviously, the "Sabbath Law" of Christ requires us to "serve one another"—to "look, every man, not on his own things . . . but also on the things of others" (Phil. 2 4). If we profess, in our acts of worship on S., to "love God, Whom we have not seen," let us endeavour to "deny ourselves," so far at least as to secure for "our brother, whom we have seen," the same opportunity for the duties and privileges of the Lord's Day as we ourselves enjoy—too often at his expense.

The application of this principle to the case of servants, shopkeepers and their assistants, railway-men, postal and telegraph officials, and other public or municipal employes, drivers, conductors, and others engaged in trams, omnibuses, motors, taxicabs, etc., and especially variety artistes, actors, musicians, cinematograph operators and others employed (to the number, it is said, of over 500,000) in the "Amusement Industry," is a subject of urgent and increasing national importance; but its further consideration, within the limits of this paper, obviously cannot be attempted.

Defensive action for safeguarding Sunday. It is important to distinguish between (i) the sphere of Religious and spiritual influence, 14. Sunday and (ii) the true functions and limitations of Legislation.

(i) The only permanent safeguard of the religious observance of the Lord's Day—an institution essentially religious in its origin and in all its highest purposes—will obviously be found in the personal life of individual Christians. "When men become Christ-like, then—and not till then—will the world become Christian";¹ not until the "Lord of the Sabbath" shall have resumed His rightful throne upon the hearts of His professing followers, will the true "joy and gladness" of the Christian S. be fully realised.

This result can never be achieved by any earthly legislation: the influences that alone can lead to its achievement lie wholly in the spiritual sphere of the Kingdom of Grace. Thus it rests with the Christian Church itself to re-ignite that fire of Faith and Love which alone can restore to the nation the motive force that inspires the due observance of the Lord's Day.

(ii) Here we reach the point where the true functions of legislation, in a Christian State, can be clearly apprehended. It is not

15. (b) Legislative. the duty of the legislature to encroach upon the spiritual province of the Christian Church, by prescribing or defining the religious observance of Sunday. But it is clearly the duty of a Christian legislature to safeguard, for all classes and sections of the community, the opportunity for such observance.

The distinction between the respective provinces of religion and of legislation in this matter has not always been sufficiently recognised in the history of our English "Sunday" laws; and this probably accounts for the fact that while, since the beginning of this century, nearly every leading European country has grappled with the S. question, and has conferred upon the Christian Ch. immense benefits, by passing Weekly Rest Day Acts (in all of which, though nothing is said as to the due observance of the Lord's Day, the normal Weekly Rest Day is specifically proclaimed to be S.—due provision being made for exceptional cases of necessary S. Labour); and while Canada has affirmed the same principle, still more definitely expressed, in the Lord's Day Act of 1906-07, yet, up to the present, the Imperial Parliament has made no serious attempt to safeguard the opportunity for the continued national recognition of S., the true weekly rest day of our "Church and Realm," or to restore to the toiling multitudes of Sundayless workers even that primary right to the enjoyment of the Six Days' Working Week to which the Divine Law and proved physiological necessity alike entitle them.

There are however many encouraging symptoms of a national awakening as to the urgent necessity for effective Legislation on this great subject; and the remarkable combination of the religious and industrial forces of the country which is represented in the recently constituted Imperial Sunday Alliance may here be noted. Its main practical objective is the promotion of a sound and well-considered Weekly Rest Day Bill, safeguarding S. as the normal Rest Day. The Alliance has already received recognition from the leaders of the Eng. Ch., and from both the Canterbury and York Convocations, as well as from other organised Christian communities, while its principles have been also cordially approved by the representatives of a very large number of Trade Unions, Labour Councils, and other associations of organised industry throughout the country.

That "strong and co-ordinated" defensive action on these lines, on both the spiritual and social sides, is urgently demanded, in order to arrest the disintegration of Religion inseparable from the prevalent tendency to secularise and "industrialise" the Lord's Day, was further emphatically proclaimed by the unanimous Resolution (No. 53) attached to the Encyclical Letter of the 240 archbishops and bishops assembled from all parts of the world at the Lambeth Conference of 1908.

These facts should stimulate all who value the teaching that is embodied in the PB to take an active personal share in the work of inspiring public opinion with a due appreciation of the priceless value of "the one Institution which," in the weighty words of Abp. Temple, "alone holds all Christians together," and to surrender which "would be the direct road to surrendering Religion altogether"—the Institution which has been enshrined in our ancient Liturgies from the very dawn of Christianity in these islands, and which, from the days of Egbert, Alfred and Athelstane, has been honoured in English Law, and is known to our Statute Book as "the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday." [See also WEEK (THE CHRISTIAN), § 2; and RITUAL, viii.]

It is impossible in this paper to summarise the Literature on the subject of Sunday. Omitting reference to books of earlier date, it may be said that in the text and notes of

This Manual (Mowbray, 1907) gives noteworthy proof of the inexhaustible treasures to be found in the PB and in the Teaching of the Eng. Ch., as supplied by "the Ideals, Privileges, and Obligations of the Christian Sunday"; as may be seen from the fact that, among its contents, is a selection of no fewer than thirty-eight distinct Courses of suggested topics and subjects for Sermons and Instructions on S. observance.

Information of much contemporary interest is collected in the Report (entitled Sunday Rest in the Twentieth Century) of the Inter. SUNDAY LETTER.—See CALENDAR, § 7, 10.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.—Although isolated efforts were made by individuals before 1780 to provide instruction for children on Sundays, yet to Robert Raikes must be given the credit of originating the system which has developed into the modern S. School. The first SS. was started by him and the Vicar of the parish, the Rev. Thomas Stock, in a private house in Gloucester in 1780. Some of the clergy regarded the innovation with suspicion, but it spread rapidly, and was eagerly taken up by the Evangelical party. Wesley strongly advocated SSs., Hannah More helped them both by her influence and by her pen, and Rowland Hill introduced them into London. In the year 1787 not less than 200,000 children were said to be under instruction in S. Schools.

In 1785 the Sunday School Union was founded. The Committee consisted of Churchmen and Nonconformists. The children were gathered together without any reference to the religious body to which they belonged, and were taught the great truths of the Christian Religion. The effort was intended to reach those who were growing up in complete ignorance and were likely to form the criminal class of the future. The hours of instruction were from four to seven, besides attendance at Church.

In 1843 the Church of England Sunday School Institute was formed, in consequence of the exclusion of the Ch. Cat. from the catalogue of the Union. The object of the Institute was to extend the SS. system in connection with the Ch. of Eng. and to improve the Schools. The means employed have been :—the foundation of local Associations, the publication of courses of lessons and other literature helpful to teachers, the organisation of meetings for discussion, model lessons, the examination of teachers, the establishment of Days of Intercession, etc. In these and in other ways the work of the Institute has been invaluable to the SSs. of the Church. The latest statistics (1910) show that the number of teachers in Ch. of Eng. SSs. is 215,354, of scholars (under 15) 2,518,918, and of members of Bible Classes 676,461.

Invaluable as the work of the SS. has been, there has been a growing feeling of late years that there are serious deficiencies in organisation and management which should be remedied. While the Day Schools have been progressing in equipment, methods and organisation, in too many cases the SS. has been standing still. It is obvious that children who attend both Day and SS. can hardly help drawing comparisons unfavourable to the latter. There are indeed some who contend that no such comparison should be instituted, that the object of the SS. is rather to establish friendly social relations with the children, and that more depends upon the religious earnestness and personality of the teacher than upon his methods. But, without underrating the importance of these, it is clear that the better the organisation of the school the greater opportunity the teacher has to throw himself into the work without being hampered and distracted by inattention, noise and irreverence. So strongly has this been felt recently that a decided movement in favour of the reform of the SS. has sprung up throughout the country. Courses of lectures in the art of teaching have been given to SS. teachers with considerable success; Training Colleges have opened their doors to SS. teachers for short periods of training; and altogether a movement has been begun which is gathering strength and is fraught with much good for the future.

The organisation of SSs. presents certain problems which do not exist in the Day Schools. The size and position of the classes, for example, is in certain buildings very difficult to arrange, but these and such-like matters are most important for the order and tone of the school, and it is imperative that the Ch. should face these difficulties and overcome them if the SS. of the future is to be a success. Another very important point in SS. organisation is the conduct of the religious exercises. Too often, the deplorable absence of reverence is only too patent: yet the function of the SS. should be to inculcate reverence and to instil the spirit of true worship. This is best attained by the Superintendent and the teachers being themselves patterns of reverence, and by the choice of hymns and prayers suitable for the children. We need graded hymns and prayers as well as graded instruction. The children should not face each other, but should all look one way, i.e., towards the Superintendent or other conductor of the worship. Under the present conditions of SSs. it is probably better, as in Day Schools, for the children to stand than kneel during the prayers.

The question of Grading has been much discussed lately. It is a question of educational common sense. Without grading we force upon some sections of the school instruction and religious exercises which are not intelligible to them, and create lack of interest, want of attention, and all the ills that follow. Grading implies that the School should be divided into groups according to the knowledge and attainments of the scholars, and not upon any other basis. Each group will then have religious exercises and lessons suited for it. The custom of having the same subject as the lesson for the whole school is educationally unsound. Psychology teaches us where to draw the line. The lowest group will consist of children from four to eight years of age, the next of children from eight to eleven, the third of children from eleven to fifteen. In the last of these groups should come the Confirmation of the child, after which he should pass into a still higher group. Of course, circumstances may modify these divisions in individual cases, but as a rule they should hold good.

Closely allied to the organisation of the school is the office and work of the Superintendent. In too many cases this officer undertakes duties which would be better left to the teachers, e.g., the maintenance of order and the marking of registers. The intervention of the Superintendent for these purposes sadly interferes with the lessons of the teachers. A lesson interrupted is generally a lesson spoiled. These matters are better left in the hands of the teachers, as they are in our Day Schools. The function of the Superintendent should be to conduct the religious exercises and to inspire, help and train the teachers. He should be himself an able teacher, who in his time has done good work in a SS. and is now entrusted with the important work of helping others to do the same. He should train the young teachers, conduct the weekly preparation class, discuss all matters connected with the welfare of the School with the other teachers, and generally place his experience and wisdom at their disposal. A well-organised SS. will also have its Secretary, Treasurer, Librarian, Pianist, and other minor officials.

Lastly, we turn to the most vital question of the supply and training of teachers. It is not too much to say that the whole question of the supply of teachers has been generally dealt with in the most haphazard manner.

Anyone who has been willing to teach has been accepted, whether qualified by knowledge or by ability to teach or not. No more fatal mistake can be made than to aim at quantity rather than quality. Again, young teachers are often discouraged by being placed in charge of a class without having any guidance or help, with the result that they give up the work as one for which they are unfit. No part of the SS. system needs more systematic treatment than this.

As regards the supply, there is an abundant source from which to draw in the best of our elder scholars. The teacher of the Bible Class will not be content with merely giving good lessons, but will seek to inspire the members of the class with the desire to do some work for God. He will be on the look-out for the bright boy or girl who will be likely to make a good teacher. Here then is the source of supply.

But how are these boys and girls to be trained for the work? Two things are necessary. They must receive systematic instruction in the subjects they are required to teach, and practical training in the art of teaching. The first of these should come through a weekly class held by one of the clergy or by the Superintendent. It will probably be urged that young teachers will not come to a preparatory class, but this is by no means universally the case; and it is best to let them know clearly how essential it is that the SS. Teacher should be thoroughly equipped for his work. In the preparatory class next Sunday's lesson will be studied—not only the meaning of the passage, but also the best way of presenting it to the children, the illustrations that should be used, and the application that should follow.

The second necessity, the training in practical teaching, should be a gradual process. The coming teacher should first sit by the side of an experienced teacher and observe his manner of teaching. He should make notes of the divisions of the lesson: he should watch the way in which the class is handled and the lesson developed. After some weeks of this observation he may be allowed to give a lesson himself, while the experienced teacher sits by and afterwards points out mistakes and shows how the lesson could have been improved. The young teacher will gradually increase the number of lessons he gives, until he passes into the ranks of the regular teachers.

We have now touched upon the chief points of SS. reform. It is much to be hoped that the Ch. will throw herself heartily into this movement, and spare no pains to make the SS. a thoroughly efficient part of her parochial machinery.—K6.

SUPEREROGATION.—The term originated in Lk. 10 35 (Vulg.), "payment in excess": a supposed surplus of merit acquired by "voluntary works besides, over and above God's commandments" (Art. 14), stored by the saints in the "treasury of the Church," and applicable for the sake of others, by way of INDULGENCES or otherwise.—K3.

W. Y. FAUSSET.

SUPREMACY, ROYAL, means, in modern constitutional law, the supremacy of the sovereign acting constitutionally, i.e., in legislation with the advice of Parliament, in administration with that of his responsible advisers, and judicially through his properly-constituted courts. There is no scope now left for arbitrary personal action on the part of the sovereign.

(1) In general. The RS. means that "all persons" (i.e., every subject, of whatever standing, age, religion, etc.) are subject to the Crown acting constitutionally; and "in all causes," i.e., that no question of law can be decided, nor any decision enforced, except in the King's Courts. This does not mean that voluntary or quasi-statutable associations (e.g., railway companies, clubs, the Royal Society, etc.) may not have internal rules, which, in certain circumstances, the King's Courts might take cognisance of and enforce; but such rules are "law" in a secondary and indirect sense, i.e., not per se the law of the land, but the (ex hypothesi) lawful rules of the society in question.

So far as concerns the exclusion of Papal or other foreign Power, the scope of the RS. is covered by the above definition. But it was impossible in the circumstances of the 16th century to carry out this effectively without "Royal" (i.e., State) intervention in the internal affairs of the Church.

(2) In relation to an Established Church. By virtue of the RS. the "law" of the Ch. becomes the law of the land, and therefore alterable only by statute. The administration of the Ch. falls under the ultimate responsibility of the King's advisers, and the tribunals which interpret and enforce the Church's law become "the King's Courts" (Hooker, Eccles. Pol. viii. 8 7). This latter fact is irrespective of the question of the final appeal, which must in any case—whether an "Established Church" exists or not—go to the King's Court.

(3) In relation to the Church of England. The PB proper includes no reference to the eccles.

supremacy of the Crown, but the title "Supreme Governour of the Ch. of England" is claimed by the sovereign in the Declaration prefixed to the 39 Arts., and an explanation of the "chief government" (of the Church) attributed to the sovereign is contained in Art. 37. This Art., together with the Royal Injunctions of 1559, to which it refers for corroboration, are of primary importance as furnishing contemporaneous expositions of the Elizabethan Act of Supremacy, which is the statutory foundation upon which the doctrine or fact of the Royal Supremacy is established at the present day. The exact position taken up by Elizabeth cannot, however, rightly be understood from these enactments alone, without regard also to the history of the formal assertion of the RS. during the twenty-eight years which preceded the passing of the Elizabethan Act.

The formal assertion in question had its immediate origin in the desire of Henry VIII to obtain from the Pope a declaration of the nullity of his marriage with Katharine of Aragon. This the Pope, for political reasons, was unable to grant; whereupon Henry resolved to deprive both the Pope and the National Ch. of the power of interposing any further obstacles to the execution of his design. In 1531, with a view to obtaining the ready assent of the clergy whensoever the question of the "divorce" should be laid before them, he compelled the Convocations, by means of a threat of præmunire for having acquiesced in the legatine powers of Wolsey, to recognise him as ecclesiae et cleri Anglicani singularem protectorem unicum et supremum dominum et quantum per Christi legem licet etiam supremum caput. The following year (1532) was marked by the "Submission of the Clergy," whereby the Conv. of Cant. formally conceded that the Royal Licence was necessary for Conv. to meet, and to make canons, and agreed that all existing canons should be revised by a commission appointed by the King for that purpose. Meanwhile Parliament had begun to pass a series of Acts, culminating in the Statute of Appeals (1532, 24 H. VIII, c. 12), by which the papal jurisdiction was abolished and the supremacy of the Crown over all persons within the realm, as well eccles. as civil, was secured. In 1533 the reduction of the spirituality was clinched by the Statute of Submission in which the essential part of the "Submission of the Clergy" was converted into an Act of Parliament (25 H. VIII, c. 19). By this Act the final appeal in eccles. matters was to be from the Archbishops' Courts to the King in Chancery, and the causes were to be heard by commissioners appointed by the King for the purpose. A Statute of the following year enacted that the King is "the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England" as recognised by the clergy of the realm in their Convocations, and also that the Crown "shall have full power and authority. . . to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts and enormities . . . which by any manner spiritual authority or jurisdiction ought or may be lawfully reformed," etc. (1534, 26 H. VIII, c. 1). The title of "Supreme Head in earth of the Church of England," which this Act bestowed upon the King, did not necessarily confer any new powers, and indeed the Headship of the Ch. was therein treated as though it were an ancient and recognised magistracy to which appertained certain dignities, honours, etc., too familiar to need definition; but by recognising as belonging to the Headship the right to visit, reform, etc., all eccles. mischief, which by any spiritual authority ought to be amended, it clearly transferred to the Crown the power to administer the affairs of the Ch., to make spiritual laws, to decide spiritual cases, and to be the source of jurisdiction as distinct from the immemorial right of seeing that the spiritual authorities exercised their jurisdiction justly. All these powers were in fact exercised by Henry VIII and the Council under Edward VI. In 1535 Henry appointed his chief Minister, Thomas Cromwell, as his representative (vicegerent, vicar-general, etc.) in eccles. affairs, and by letters patent expressly authorised him to visit in the name of the King. He further exercised the right of supreme control in eccles. administration by issuing independently ordinances relating to spiritual matters known as Royal INJUNCTIONS.

The only certain limitation of the eccles. power claimed by Henry VIII and his successor was the "ius ordinis" or powers which spring from consecration, which were expressly disclaimed by Henry in a letter of 1533 to Bishop Tunstall of Durham.

In consequence of the reaction under Mary the Statute of Supreme Head was repealed, and a return was apparently made to the attitude which the Crown had adopted towards the Church before the Reformation.

On the accession of Elizabeth in 1558 an Act was at once passed "restoring to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state eccles. and spiritual and abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same" (1559, 1 Eliz., c. 2). After determining the negative side of the eccles. supremacy by excluding all foreign jurisdiction, this Statute enacted positively "that such jurisdictions, privileges, superiorities and preeminences, spiritual and eccles., as by any spiritual or eccles. power or authority have heretofore, or may lawfully be exercised or used for the visitation of the eccles. state or persons, and for the reformation order and correction of the same, and of all manner or errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts and enormities, shall for ever by authority of this present Parliament be united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm"; that the Queen might assign such person or persons as she might think meet to exercise the supreme eccles. jurisdiction thus recognised; and that all spiritual and temporal officers should take an oath that according to their conscience the Queen was "Supreme Governor in all causes spiritual as well as temporal."

(4) Conclusion. It will be seen that although the rank or legal position of "Supreme Governor . . . in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things and causes" was thus substituted for the statutory title of "Supreme Head in earth of the Church of England" (which title has never been revived), yet there was not in the Act itself any substantial surrender of the royal power in matters eccles. It restored to the Crown the jurisdiction visitatorial and corrective, which had been recognised by Henry's Act of Supreme Head as belonging to the supremacy, in terms differing but slightly from the corresponding clause of that Act. In short, by this Act the Royal Supremacy was restored to the extent to which it had been claimed by Henry VIII. Nevertheless, a real and substantial change in the conception and exercise of the RS. accompanied the passing of the Act. This result was produced by the official interpretations of the Act put forth by Elizabeth, contained in the Royal Injunctions of 1559, in the Second Supremacy Act of 1562, and in the 37th Art. of Religion. The explanation (declared by 5 Eliz., c. 1, s. 14 to be authoritative) of the Supremacy Oath appended to the Royal Injns. of 1559, with the title, "An Admonition to simple men deceived by the malicious," contains a very material modification of the eccles. supremacy, as interpreted and exercised by Henry VIII and Edward VI, describing it as "of ancient time due to the imperial crown of this realm that is under God, to have the sovereignty and rule over all manner of persons born within these her realms of what estate either eccles. or temporal soever they be, so as no other foreign Power shall or ought to have any superiority over them," i.e., merely a temporal Power over eccles. persons. Similarly, in the 37th Art., the Supremacy is declared to be the right to govern all classes and orders spiritual and temporal and to punish the stubborn and evil-doers with the civil sword. On the other hand, both the Injunctions and the Second Supremacy Act expressly claim the authority used and challenged by Henry VIII.

There has never been a claim on the part of the sovereign to alter or propound doctrine, nor to determine what was heresy. The standards of doctrine remain purely eccles. in origin. But the Courts Christian exercise their function as the courts of the abps. or bps., of deciding the quaestio facti, inter partes, and on this question an appeal must lie to the King, acting constitutionally, as the source of justice. His court, in deciding such an appeal, does not, of course, decide what is the true doctrine, but whether such and such incriminated statements agree or not with the standards recognised by the Ch. and Realm.—A2.

SURCINGLE.—See GIRDLE.

SURETY.—See GODPARENTS.

SURPLICE.—A word derived from the Latin superpellicium, the garment worn over the pellicium, a woollen or furred coat. The surplice is a long, full, flowing vesture of white linen, with long and wide-winged sleeves, sometimes embroidered on the collar. In its true form the S. is not cut open down the front as a cloak, but has a hole at the collar through which the wearer's head passes. The custom of having the S. open in front appears to have been introduced in the seventeenth cent., when large wigs were worn, and when the putting on of the older form of the surplice would have disarranged their appearance.

As evidence of the length and fulness of the old English S., it may be observed, as examples, that in 1474 a lady named Elizabeth Andrews made the following bequests: "I will that Stoke church shall have a surplice made of a piece of linen cloth containing 26 yards . . . to the church of Weston, 20 yards of linen cloth to make a surplice" (Nicholas, Testamenta Vetusta 1 329, 330). In the year 1661 £4 was paid "for the President's surplice" (Fowler, Hist. of Corpus Christi Coll., p. 359); whilst in 1662, at St. Oswald's, Durham, we find, "For 11 yeardees of Holland att 3s. 2d. a yeard for a new surplice for our minister, £1 14s. 10d. (Durham Parish Books, Surtees Soc., p. 198). In the year 1621, Cosin, as archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire, asked, in his articles of inquiry, "Have you a comely and a large surplice, with wide and long sleeves?" Bishop Curle of Winchester, in 1636, similarly inquired, "Have you a comely large surplesse with large sleeves?" The modern short, tight-fitting S. with lace at the hem, borrowed from recent continental examples, is a degraded form of the English S., and was certainly not "in use in this Church of England in the second year of the reign of K. Edward VI," and is therefore not authorised for use in the present day.

Durandus, the great exponent of mediæval ceremonial, observes that as the garments used by the Jewish priesthood were girt tight about them, to signify the bondage of the Law, so the looseness of the S., used by the Christian priests, signifies the freedom of the Gospel (Rationale 33).

The S. is appointed by the rubrics of the PB of 1549, to which the Ornaments Rubric of the present PB refers for guidance, to be worn by the clergy, "in the saying or singing of Matins and Evensong, baptising, and burying." The S. is thus the ordinary ecclesiastical vesture of the minister in all services other than the Eucharist. In addition or supplementary to the general direction of the Ornaments Rubric, the S. is ordered by the canons of 1604 to be worn in cathedral and collegiate churches when there is no Communion, i.e., at Choir Offices (can. 25); whilst in parish churches, it is ordered (can. 58) that "every minister saying the public prayers, or ministering the Sacraments, or other rites of the Church, shall wear a decent and comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish." This direction, in appointing the use of the S. in ministering the Communion, is [on the view taken in this art.] at variance with the direction of the Ornaments Rubric, which requires the vestures named in the PB of 1549 to be retained and to be in use. Under that Book, in the second year of King Edward VI, the S. was not worn at the Communion, but, as stated above, at "Matins and Evensong, baptising and burying"—other vestures being required for the Communion. (See ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER, and [for a different view] ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.)—R3, V. STALEY.

SURROGATE.—(1) A duly qualified deputy appointed by an eccles. judge to act in his stead, who is required (canon 128) to be "either a grave Minister and a Graduate, or a licensed public Preacher, and a benefited man near the place where the courts are kept, or a Bachelor of Law, or a Master of Arts at least, who hath some skill in the Civil and Eccles. Law, and is a favourer of true religion, and a man of modest and honest conversation." The formalities of appointment (e.g., of canon 123) must be strictly followed, otherwise all the appointee's acts are invalid.

(2) The most usual function of Ss. at present is the granting of marriage LICENCES (which see) whereby the triple publication of banns is dispensed with (canons 101 ff.). By the Marriage Act, 1823, § 18, no S. must grant a licence "until he hath taken an oath . . . faithfully to execute his office according to law, to the best of his knowledge, and hath given security by his bond in the sum of £100."—A5.

SURSUM CORDA.—This invitation is to be found in all the Liturgies, Eastern and Western alike (cp. Hammond, Liturgies, pp. 12, 40, 68, 106, 152, 180, 272, 322-3, 365), and is generally preceded by a mutual salutation of priest and people. The common form (in Latin) is: V. Sursum Corda. R. Habemus ad Dominum. V. Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro. R. Dignum et iustum est. And the Greek form is very similar. Slight variations are noted by Scudamore (NE, p. 525).

The SC. is referred to in the Canons of Hippolytus (3 23-26); Cyprian (De Dom. Orat. 31); Cyril of Jer. (Cat. Myst. 5 4, 5); and Augustine (Serm. 117). In some of the Sacramentaries, e.g. the Gel., the Canon begins with SC. With regard to the first Response Augustine (De Ver. Rel. 3) says: "Daily throughout the whole world the human race almost with one voice replies that it lifts its heart up unto the Lord." On the whole there is little reason to doubt that the SC. was a portion of the original nucleus of the earliest Ordo. It emphasises the beginning of the Thanksgiving proper in the Service (cp. Chrysostom, 18th Hom. on 2 Cor.)—H2.

SURVEYOR.—The Office of Surveyor of Eccles. Dilapidations owes its origin to the Eccles. Dilapidations Act, 1871. The appointment is made by the Archdeacons and Rural Deans of the Diocese subject to the approval of the Bp., and may be general or for a limited term, and may be for the whole or part of the Diocese. The Surveyor is paid according to a rate of charges fixed in each Diocese by the Bp., the Archdeacons, the Rural Deans and the Chancellor. It is not lawful for a Surveyor to be interested directly or indirectly in any work to be executed under the Act.

It may be convenient to mention here that the Act is purely administrative and has no bearing directly or indirectly upon the law as to dilapidations. The Act, however, imposes upon every Incumbent an obligation to insure all Glebe buildings against loss or damage by fire, in his name jointly with the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, in at least three-fifths of the value thereof. If buildings not insured or insufficiently insured be destroyed or damaged by fire, the amount required to reinstate the buildings will be certified by the Surveyor and be a debt due from the Incumbent.—A6.

T. H. ARDEN.

SUSPENSION.—The withdrawal for a limited time of the right to perform clerical duties (S. ab officio), to which is sometimes added (in the case of an incumbent) temporary deprivation¹ (S. ab officio et a beneficio). The sentence usually provides that the suspension will not be relaxed without evidence of the offender's good behaviour.²—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

SYMBOL.—A S. is an object, action, or form, conveying to the mind some idea, simple or complex, not essentially involved in it, but imposed on it by custom or authority.

Before the invention of writing Ss. furnished primitive society with a useful system of sign-language. Out of symbolic writing

1. Origin. the letters of the alphabet were evolved, which are themselves Ss. of sounds, as sounds are Ss. of thought and emotion. Among civilised communities Ss. are employed to impress the imagination with the dignity of the kingly office, the majesty of law, the authority of parliament, the gradations of rank in the army and navy, the doctrines of the Ch. (see CREED), the functions of the Christian ministry, etc., while in domestic and social life a symbolical etiquette secures for each individual a due recognition of his place or worth.

All fully developed religious systems have had recourse to Ss. for the expression of religious and ethical ideas, and of this the religion of ancient Israel is a notable example.

2. Justification. Every detail in the elaborate adornment of the Temple and its ministry had a symbolic signification. When through the lapse of time the original meaning of a S. is lost, a new one may be imposed upon it, and in this way it is probable some of the Ss. employed in the worship of the Israelites were adaptations from an earlier cult, as in turn the writer of the Ep. to the Hebrews adapted the symbolism of the Temple to Christian use. After the Captivity the use of symbolic forms in literature became increasingly prevalent, as in Daniel and the later apocalyptic literature. But the justification for Christ's Ss. resides less in OT precedents than in the example of our Lord who sanctioned them by the use of bread, wine and water in the Sacrs., attended Himself the highly symbolic services of the Temple, and actually based one of His most important discourses on the symbolic vine, which was one of its most conspicuous adornments. The Holy of Holies, with its empty throne and its dark interior, was itself a majestic S. of the Unseen God "dark with excess of light."

² As to the obsolete discipline of a layman by suspension ab ingressu ecclesiae for brawling (5 Edw. VI, c. 4), see Gibson, Cod. (1761) 1047.]

So long as the Christian Ch. remained under the influence of Jewish ideas, and subsequently when it was engaged in active warfare with

2. Development. pagan idolatry, the use of Ss. was restricted. The earliest representations of Christ in art were the symbolic Shepherd and Lamb, while for the expression of faith in the resurrection the S. of the butterfly or the phoenix sufficed.

When the apparent danger of idolatry passed away, symbolism rapidly developed and the chs. were soon lavishly adorned with mosaics and pictures. Against these symbolic devices Leo the Isaurian (726), a brave but ignorant soldier utterly destitute of taste and learning, actuated probably by some superstitious motive of Moslem origin, initiated a violent iconoclastic campaign, by which the chs. of Constantinople were quickly freed from every vestige of picture, image and symbol. This reign of terror for the "orthodox" terminated with the Empress Theodora (842), and from that time for many cents. no further protest was made against the use of emblems of any kind in religious worship, although it was evident to devout people that the uninstructed laity regarded many of them as possessing occult powers, and that in their case veneration too often passed into idolatry. The prevailing tendency of the time was, however, to accept the will for the deed, and for the Ch. as a vast corporate body to take over the responsibility for mistakes of individuals, thus freeing the faithful from anxiety so long as they lived obediently to their spiritual superiors and died fortified by the Sacraments.

Against the gross and manifest misuse of relics and images the Reformers raised an emphatic protest, asserting in the most uncompromising terms the great principle of individual responsibility. To save men from losing their souls through idolatry, they thought it necessary to abolish all those relics and images which had led them so long astray. The attitude of the Ch. of Eng. in this great movement is well displayed in the chapter "Of Ceremonies" in the Pref. to the PB; yet so violent was the Puritanical outburst against idolatry that she had difficulty in retaining even such obviously harmless and useful Ss. as the cross in Bapt. (see canon 30) and the ring in Marriage. During the brief period of Puritan ascendancy many priceless monuments of art were ruthlessly destroyed, and, although at the Restoration this aggressive iconoclasm came to an abrupt close, the prejudice against Ss. continued throughout the following century. Even now it is not unusual to hear it said that religion is most spiritual when it is least symbolic, whereas in reality the abolition of the S. frequently results in the entire loss of the substance which stands behind it. Another popular objection to Christian Ss. is that in some instances a S. has had a heathen origin, as if the origin were of more significance than the present meaning. The only question worth considering is that which the Ch. of Eng. answered at the Reformation, "Is the S. likely to promote right thinking and right living?" "If it is, let it be retained; if not, let it be abolished."

Among small manuals we may mention: Jenner, H., Christian Symbols; Hulme, F. E., History of Principles and Practice of Symbolism in Christian Art.)—R4. E. A. WESLEY.

SYMPHONY.—The word S., used with respect to the PB, must be taken in its older meaning, viz., to express any portions or passages whatever of music which are thrown into relief as purely instrumental, in works in which the chief interest is centred in the voice or voices. So applied, it is synonymous with Interlude, and may be meant in the Pss. where "Selah" is found in the Bible version, though this is doubtful, as "Selah" may be a direction for the instruments to strike up with an accompaniment.—Q3. F. DARBY.

SYNOD.—1. A provincial S. is an assembly of the bps. and clergy of a province. 2. A diocesan S. is an assembly of the clergy of a diocese under the presidency of the bp. 3. The sacred S. of the Ch. of Eng. is the Conv. of Cant. and York sitting separately or together. The word S. is also used of representative bodies, connected with non-established Anglican Chs., which include laymen. One of the most obvious needs of the present day is the restoration of effective synodical action in the Eng. Ch. So far as the diocese is concerned, a representative Diocesan Council of manageable size would appear to be, on the one hand, an invaluable instrument for the strengthening of the bp.'s hands, either for counsel, initiative or administration; and, on the other hand, a not unnecessary safeguard against occasional ill-advised or arbitrary episcopal action. See further, CONVOCATION, COUNCIL, DIOCESAN BISHOP, EPISCOPACY, ORDER.—A2. G. HARFORD.

SYNODALS.—(1) Festa Synodalia, i.e., festivals not observed by the Church at large, but peculiar to some particular diocese: permission to keep them having been granted by the bishop in Synod—so in Pref.; (2) fees payable to the bp. of common right, perhaps in recognition of his having an interest in the parochial revenues bef. they were assigned to the incumbent, and only due to any other (as archdeacon, or dean and chapter) by prescription; (3) constitutions made in the provincial or diocesan synods.—B2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

TABLES OF COMMANDMENTS.—As early as the 15th cent. we have records of the C. being set up in churches, apparently for the instruction of the people. The Orders of 1561 and the Advertisements (1566) directed that the C. be placed at the East end of the church, and the bishops accordingly are found demanding compliance with the new directions. Canon 82 reiterated the requirement, but the Privy Council has since decided that the canon is satisfied if the C. be placed on the east wall of the nave, in churches where the people could not read them if inscribed on the east chancel wall [cp. RITUAL, § 104 f. 18 and n.].—R5. S. REDMAN.

TAPERERS.—(Sarum Missal "Ceroferarii.") Two men or boys who carried candlesticks containing lighted candles in procession at High Mass (see SERVER).—R2. J. E. SWALLOW.

TAPESTRY.—A fabric of wool, silk, silver or gold, worked into a pattern; resembling textile fabrics, except that the threads are worked into the warp one by one by hand. From the later Middle Ages until comparatively recent times, T. was hung upon church walls for ornamentation, e.g., DORSALS.—R4. S. REDMAN.

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS.—The ancient Latin hymn which begins with these three words has been in use in the services of the 1. Origin. Western Church for more than 1,400 years. It can be traced with certainty to the fifth cent., and it may possibly belong to the early years of that cent. As yet no secure answer can be given as to its author. We may with confidence dismiss the old tradition, generally accepted in the Middle Ages, that it was composed by St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, and recited by them in alternate verses on the occasion of the baptism of the latter. That it was the work of Ambrose alone has been by some inferred from its old designation as Hymnus Ambrosianus. This and the various guesses that have subsequently had supporters, connecting it with Hilary of Arles, or Nicetius of Trèves, or Nicetius of Vienne, or (most recently, as advocated by Dom G. Morin, Revue Bénédictine, April, 1890) Nicetas of Rematiana in Dacia, are, none of them, supported by such evidence as to carry conviction. As to the author we can only say, he is unknown.

The quarter of the Church where the hymn first makes its appearance is Southern Gaul. The subject of its origin and early texts has been discussed with much learning in our own day by E. C. S. Gibson (now Bishop of Gloucester), and by J. Wordsworth (late Bishop of Salisbury), and to their writings (see below Bibliography) the student who desires to see the evidence exhibited in detail is referred.

The earliest mention of Te D. is to be found in the Rule for Monks of Cæsarius, Bishop of Arles (composed before 502). Te D.

2. Early Use. was then evidently well known, and is ordered to be used at morning service on the Lord's Day; and it is as a morning hymn on the Lord's Day that Te D. appears in many of the early Psalters. As late as 831 it was (as we learn from Amalarius) sung at Rome only on the natalitia of the Popes. Rome was always slow in adopting liturgical changes. In mediæval England, in the uses of Sarum and York, the general rule, without going into details, prescribed Te D. for Sundays and feasts of nine Lessons at Matins, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter. On the Sundays and the feasts occurring within the excepted periods another canticle was not substituted for Te D., but simply the short response after the ninth Lesson was repeated. The practice of substituting Benedicite for Te D. is not based on mediæval precedent.

Our English rule of singing Te D. after the first Lesson was perhaps suggested by a like rule in some German service-books, e.g., 3. Prayer Book that of Calenberg and Göttingen, published in 1542.

In the PB of 1549 Te D. was ordered to be used "daily throughout the year, except in Lent, all the which time in the place of Te Deum shall be used Benedicite omnia opera Domini Domino in English." It may fairly be questioned whether it might not have been better to have reserved Te D. for Sundays and festivals; and it may also be questioned whether Benedicite, a canticle of unbroken joyousness, was the best substitute for it in Lent. But, whatever answer may be given to these questions, in the PB of 1552 the injunction with regard to Lent was removed, and ever since there has been freedom to use either Te D. or Benedicite on any day in the year.

We now proceed to examine the structure and the text of this noble hymn. And, first, it may be asserted with probability, reaching

4. Integrity. almost to certainty, that the concluding eight verses, in the form with which we are familiar, are no part of the original hymn, which probably ended with the verse translated in our version by the words "Make them to be numbered with thy saints in glory everlasting." Indeed, with the exception of "Vouchsafe, O Lord, to keep us this day without sin," all these verses are drawn from familiar passages of Scripture—see Ps. 279=2810, Ps. 1442=1452, Ps. 562=571, Ps. 3222=3321, Ps. 302=311. (The first numbering is that of the Latin Vulgate, with which and the earlier Latin version the verses in Te D. should be compared.) Moreover, these verses have no special relation to the purport and intent of the earlier part, but are devout ejaculations which might be used in any service; and, as a matter of fact, most of these verses (as has been pointed out by Bishop Gibson) are, including "Vouchsafe, O Lord," etc., found, in certain Greek manuscripts, attached to the Greek morning hymn Gloria in excelsis.

Turning to the part of Te D. preceding these verses we can perceive that it consists of two quite distinct sections, having even the appearance of

5. Sections. being two distinct hymns—the second, addressed to Christ, beginning with the words "Thou art the king of glory," etc. We must dismiss the view (which formerly was maintained by some) that the opening part of Te D. is also addressed to Christ. It is possible, no doubt, to translate Te Deum Laudamus by the words "We praise thee as God"; but, even if the phrase "the Father everlasting" in verse 2 (derived from Is. 96) may be rightly applied to Christ, vv. 11, 12, 13 (and more particularly the words "thine honourable, true, and only Son") are fatal to that view. Yet sudden transitions in regard to the divine Person addressed are sufficiently numerous in ancient devotional writings to make it quite possible that (excepting the concluding verses) the whole forms a single composition. If the Gloria in excelsis is examined it will be found to exhibit this phenomenon.

It is particularly interesting to observe that the fruit of the recent investigation into the structure of Te D. is exhibited in the triple division of the hymn, as it appears in the Accession Service, agreed upon by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and authorised by Royal Warrant (Nov. 9, 1901).

The rhythmical structure of Te D. (much obscured in the English translation) has been well exhibited by Rev. W. C. Bishop, but for the sake

6. Structure. of brevity we can here only exhibit its features in outline. Mr. Bishop (dismissing the cento of the eight concluding verses) arranges the verses thus: Group I, "Te Deum . . ."; "Te Dominum . . ."; "Te aeternum Patrem . . ."; Group II, "Tibi omnes . . ."; "Tibi caeli . . ."; "Tibi Cherubim . . ." followed by "incessabili voce proclamant" and the "sanctus"; Group III, "Te gloriosus . . ."; "Te Prophetarum . . ."; "Te Martyrum . . ."; Group IV, "Te per orbem . . ." followed by the mention of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; Group V, "Tu Rex gloriae . . ."; "Tu Patris . . ."; Group VI, "Tu ad liberandum . . ."; "Tu devicto . . ."; "Tu ad dexteram . . ."; Group VII, "Te ergo . . . numerari." Each group of rhythmical verses opens with the pronoun "Thou" or "Thee" or "To Thee" (Tu, or one of its cases), and the "Tu," or "Te," or "Tibi" is, in most instances, thrice repeated.

Some observations may now be offered on certain features of the text and of the English translation in the PB. (1) v. 15, "everlasting Son"

7 Text. (sempiternus filius); the reference is probably to the eternal generation of the Son, and the word "eternal" would be better than "everlasting." (2) v. 17, "the sharpness of death" (aculeo mortis) obscures the clear reference to "the sting of death" (1 Cor. 15 55, 56), where in the old Latin version (though not in Jerome's) aculeus is used. (3) v. 16, "when thou tookest upon thee to deliver man" (tu ad liberandum suscepturus hominem) misses the sense: the thought is "when thou tookest man (= human nature) to deliver (him)": and the next words, "Thoudidst not abhor," etc., point to the Word's taking human nature of the Virgin Mary. The structure of the Latin is somewhat rude, and Bishop Wordsworth observes that the text of the 16th verse shows more variation of readings than any other. The variations point to difficulties which it was sought to smooth by alterations in the text. There is an old Irish text that reads ad liberandum mundum ("to deliver the world"). Some able scholars have thought that this text (which runs in the Antiphony of Bangor, Tu ad liberandum mundum suscepisti hominem) represents the original text. But the present writer, familiar with other striking examples of Irish ecclesiastics improving (as they imagined) on well-known texts, cannot assent to this view. It is, moreover, in the highest degree improbable that all Europe, save Ireland, had lost the true text. (4) vv. 7, 8, 9. The language of the Latin of "the glorious company of the Apostles," etc., finds (as was long ago observed) a close parallel in the last chapter of St. Cyprian's De Mortalitate, and one can scarcely doubt it was suggested by it. Bishop Wordsworth has pointed out that the word numerus, in the phrase Prophetarum laudabilis numerus ("the goodly fellowship of the Prophets"), was often used technically for a large body of troops, and he suggests that there is here a crescendo, reaching its climax in the "noble army" of v. 9. The original of "the noble army of Martyrs" is "candidatus exercitus Martyrum," which some would prefer to see rendered "white-robed army of Martyrs." The present writer has shown that candidatus, like numerus, was a word of military associations. The candidati of the Roman army were, at least from the time of the Emperor Gordian (239-244) onwards, a picked body of troops, forming the bodyguard of the Emperor. They wore a white vesture over their armour. The writer of Te D. may have thought of the great multitude of the Martyrs in heaven forming a guard round the throne of their King, in vesture made white in the blood of the Lamb. (5) v. 21, "make them to be numbered," etc. In mediæval script the words numerari and munerari are so much alike in appearance that variant readings very naturally arose. Probably the correct text is munerari. The idea of "reward" is not involved in the word, and the verse might be rendered "make them to be granted with thy saints the glory everlasting." The English reformers naturally followed the text (numerari) as they found it in the printed Breviaries of Sarum and York.

This magnificent hymn has attracted some of the most eminent of musical composers, both British and foreign. The Cathedral Music of Handel as a thanksgiving for the victory at Dettingen. In our own day the noble composition of Sir George Martin for Queen Victoria's "Diamond Jubilee" is well known.

Recent studies: the article on The Te Deum in the Church Quarterly Review for April, 1884, where the Bishop of Gloucester (E. C. S. Gibson) deals with questions of text and origin with much learning. To this should be added, for a few additional points, the article The Gloria in excelsis by the same writer in the same magazine for Oct., 1885. The late Bp. of Salisbury (J. Wordsworth) deals with the whole subject with learning and acuteness in the article Te Deum in Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology. A plea for Greek influences being seen in the Te D. will be found in Freeman's Principles of Divine Service (1 405-7). J. TEMPERANCE.—The word T. is used in the Church Cat. in connection with SOBERNESS.

1. Meaning of Word.

Some have thought in consequence that it is intended to refer to moderation in eating, but it is practically certain that both words are to be understood in the widest sense. The word T. or its cognate adjective occurs in the English NT five times as the equivalent of ἐνκρατῆς and its cognates (Acts 24 25, Gal. 5 23, 2 Pet. 1 6, 1 Cor. 9 25, Tit. 1 8), and once as the equivalent of σώφρων (Tit. 2 2), a word which is also translated sober. In 16th and 17th century English T. seems to have had precisely the same meanings as it has now. Milton uses it to mean moderation as opposed to drunkenness. Shakespeare and Spenser use it of the calmness which is free from ardent passion. Modern use has tended to confine it to moderation as opposed to drunkenness, mainly owing to its connection with the great social movement which aims at the amelioration of the drinking habits of the country. True T., of course, includes this, it is the virtue of complete self-control. Aristotle, in his Ethics, uses the word T. (ἐνκρατεῖα) to describe the sum of all human virtues. Literally, the word means command of self, control of the passions; the Church Cat. quite rightly uses it to express the positive side of the seventh commandment. The law of Christ demands not only freedom from gross sin but such complete control of mind, will, motive and passion, as shall reach and transcend the Aristotelian ideal. One of the most grievous breaches of that law of Christ in modern times is due to the excessive use of alcohol. And consequently the first T. reformers were quite right in claiming the word T. as the watchword of their movement, and the establishment, somewhat later, of the Church of England Temperance Society was the bounden duty on the part of the Church in her effort to be loyal to the spirit and meaning of the Church Catechism.

The T. movement began its organised existence in 1826, but efforts had been made to meet the evil before this date. In 1552 the first Licensing Act was passed to suppress useless ale-houses. In 1750 the then Bishop of Worcester made an abortive effort to rouse public opinion on the subject. Fifty years later, both in England and America, others began similar and more successful efforts, until at last, in 1826, the American Society for the promotion of T. commenced its operations. Within four years similar societies were founded in Great Britain. These Societies almost immediately tended to recommend total abstinence, Joseph Livesey, of Preston, becoming the leader of the English movement. In 1846 a World's T. Convention was held in London, followed in seven years by the founding of the United Kingdom Alliance. The movement quickly and considerably gained the support of thinking people, and efforts were made at legislation. But public opinion moved slowly. In 1854 the Forbes Mackenzie Act gained Sunday closing for Scotland, similar Acts for Ireland and Wales, the former in 1878, the latter in 1881, following in due course. In 1876 a committee of the House of Lords discussed the subject, whilst in 1899 a Royal Commission, presided over by Viscount Peel, presented its report. Acts of Parliament in 1902 and 1905 followed, Acts which were not altogether satisfactory to the majority of T. reformers. But, whether through the growth of public opinion or the assistance of these Acts, the Drink Bill of the country, which had risen to upwards of £180,000,000, has now decreased to something under £160,000,000, and on all hands there are indications that the personal habits of the people of the country are tending in the direction of moderation.

Individual members of the Church of England had from the very first taken considerable interest in the movement, but no organised action had been taken. In 1860 some 159 abstaining clergymen sent an urgent appeal to the Times newspaper—they were compelled to insert it as an advertisement, and it almost seemed as if it would fail of its purpose. But the next year the wife of a Shrewsbury incumbent published an account of her work in her husband's parish under the title "Haste to the Rescue." By a happy inspiration it was decided to distribute 10,000 copies amongst the clergy, and, in 1862, fifty clergy met in London to organise a society which was called first "Church of England Total Abstinence Society," but the title was changed within a few months to "Church of England T. Reformation Society." The interest of the Church was aroused, and presently we find sermons being preached in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral, the preacher in the latter being Canon Ellison, Vicar of Windsor, and one of the founders of the Society. Convocation became interested, and it was felt that, if the Society were to be the representative instrument of the whole Church, it must win the sympathy of all, whether teetotalers or no, who were willing to take their share in its work; to this end it was reconstituted in 1872 on what has come to be called the "Dual Basis." It was to include for the future not only those who abstained entirely from intoxicating drink, but those who were willing to sign, and live in the spirit of, the following declaration: "I recognise my duty as a Christian to exert myself for the suppression of intemperance; and having hereby become a member of this Society, will endeavour in the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, both by example and effort, to promote its objects." Members of the abstaining section sign the following declaration: "I hereby promise, by God's help, to abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors so long as I retain this card of membership." To this declaration the following note is appended: "It is to be distinctly understood that this promise has no reference to the use of wine in the HC, or yet to the use of intoxicating liquors under medical order." The introduction of the Dual Basis was a critical time in the history of the Society. Some few valuable supporters were lost, but many more were gained. In the early days of the Dual Basis an additional pledge for the general section was brought into use confining the use of alcohol to meals, but it was not very largely used until there came into existence in 1903, through the exertions of the Rev. Frank Webster and the influence of Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, the "Semi-Teetotal Pledge Association," which, in 1904, became a section of the C.E.T.S. The declaration of this Association runs as follows: "I solemnly undertake, by God's help, to abstain from all intoxicating drink, except at my midday and evening meals." Owing to the kindly interest of two great London newspapers many thousands joined the new movement.

Something must be said of the general work of the Society. It aimed first at founding parochial branches which were affiliated to the general Society. It gives cordial and sympathetic help to efforts at legislation. In view of the enormous number of cases of intemperance which come before the various Courts of Petty Session the Society has appointed Police Court Missionaries at most of the Courts. It conducts T. missions at horse-races and other gatherings attracting large numbers of people. It issues literature, and has brought into being or assisted T. work in the Army and Navy. It has founded Inebriates' Homes both before and after legislation on the subject. It has taken its share in facing the serious problems which strong drink raises amongst native races of the world. Last and not least, it has borne an honourable part in T. work among the young—work so important as to merit a separate section in this article.

4. Work of the C.E.T.S.

In 1847 the first efforts at influencing children were made, and Bands of Hope, as they were called, came into existence. In 1855 the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union was formed, and embraced interest in the movement, but no organised action had been taken. In 1860 some 159 abstaining clergymen sent an urgent appeal to the Times newspaper—they were compelled to insert it as an advertisement, and it almost seemed as if it would fail of its purpose. But the next year the wife of a Shrewsbury incumbent published an account of her work in her husband's parish under the title "Haste to the Rescue." By a happy inspiration it was decided to distribute 10,000 copies amongst the clergy, and, in 1862, fifty clergy met in London to organise a society which was called first "Church of England Total Abstinence Society," but the title was changed within a few months to "Church of England T. Reformation Society." The interest of the Church was aroused, and presently we find sermons being preached in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral, the preacher in the latter being Canon Ellison, in the Union sixteen Bands of Hope. At the present time there are probably some 25,000 bands, comprising from four to five millions of children. Of late years much careful attention has been given to the teaching of hygiene, elementary physiology, and sociology, in relation to the use of alcohol. The C.E.T.S. and other societies have created an excellent literature on the subject, and by means of prizes and examinations have roused considerable interest. For some time voluntary teaching has been given in the Day Schools, and just recently, by the direction of the Board of Education, T. teaching is included in the time-table of all elementary schools.

3. The C.E.T.S.

The C.E.T.S. has a double aim in view—to quote the language of its own literature: (a) the reformation of the intemperate; (b) the formation of a healthy public opinion throughout the area over which its influence extends.

Parochially, these objects have been worked for by weekly or monthly meetings, at which addresses are given. Too often there is a danger that the T. meeting should degenerate into a mere entertainment society. To meet this the Central Committee have arranged lists of speakers and have provided many series of lantern slides with accompanying literature. Visitation and open-air work are adjuncts of the indoor meeting, without which thoroughly efficient work can hardly be carried on. Band of Hope meetings run on similar lines—recitations, songs, and services of song adding brightness and efficiency to them. In some dioceses—it were well if it were in all—an active general propaganda is carried on, and so the general influence of the Society is extended. T. missions are held and T. vans carry the Society's message into many a country village. It is impossible here to detail the work. Children of all classes are catered for, the Young Abstinents' Union aiming at the children of the so-called upper classes. For further details reference must be made to the Society itself at its central offices, 4 The Sanctuary, Westminster, S.W.

TENEBRÆ.—The name given to Mattins and Lauds on the last three days of Holy Week, Maundy Th., Good Fr., and Easter Eve. The office retains its most ancient form, there being no Invitatory, no hymns, and no Gloria aft. any Ps. The title (T. = darkness) was given from the fact of fifteen candles being extinguished one aft. another, until the office concluded in darkness. But this name only originated aft. it had become customary to recite each of these offices on the evening preceding the day to which they belong. Originally, they were said in the early morning, and the gradual extinguishing of the lights corresponded with the growing light of dawn.—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

TENTHS.—Although etymologically identical with "tithes," there is a distinction in eccles. law and a considerable difference in the technical use of the terms, the T. being an impost on the clergy themselves, and the TITHES a levy on their parishioners. In addition to the Annates or FIRST FRUITS, which every clergyman was called upon to pay on his induction to a benefice, he was, and is, liable to an annual tax of 10 per cent. on his income, the value of which is still calculated on the basis of the returns made to Henry VIII. Before the Reformation and the consequent rejection of papal authority in this country, the contributions from this and other sources had been claimed by, and paid to, the Pope of Rome. By the "Fidei Defensor" Act they were diverted to the royal exchequer, and so continued till restored to the Ch. by Queen Anne (see QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY). The benefices amenable are fewer than half of those in existence, the poorer livings and those of modern creation being exempt.—A6.

TERCE.—The office to be recited at the third hour, i.e., 9 a.m., but, when said in choir, somewhat earlier. (See HOURS OF PRAYER).—B2.

TERRIER.—"A T. (inventaria) of Glebe-lands (Terra in qua consistit dos ecclesiae, Lyndw. 3 28) and other possessions (terrarum et peculiorum) belonging to Churches (conficienda et in episcoporum archivis asservanda)."

"We ordain that the Abps. and all Bps. within their several dioceses shall procure (as much as in them lieth) that a true note and T. of all the glebes, lands, meadows, gardens, orchards, houses, stocks, implements, tenements and portions of tithes lying out of their parishes (which belong to any Parsonage or Vicarage or Rural Prebend) be taken by the view of honest men in every Parish by the appointment of the Bp. (whereof the Minister to be one) and be laid up in the Bp.'s Registry, there to be for a perpetual memory thereof" (canon 87).

This was an amplification of the canon of 1571. A form of T. has recently been approved by Convocation and published by SPCK. at a charge of 1/6. It is much to be desired that a T. in this form be prepared for every Parish, and a copy filed in the Diocesan Registry. The T. requires, of course, to be kept up to date.—A6.

T. H. ARDEN.

TEXTS (FOR SERMON).—The custom of prefacing a sermon with a text of Scripture was general in the early Ch. The text was invariably taken out of the Scriptures, though it would appear from some of St. Chrysostom's Homilies that preachers sometimes dispensed with one altogether. The custom has continued to the present day.

The reason for the use of a text appears to be the fact that the sermon is intended to be an exposition of scriptural truth, either an explanation of the particular text chosen or of some truth which it illuminates. In many parts of the Ch. it is most usual for the sermon to be an explanation of the Gospel for the day or of some part of it. In the Ch. of Sweden this custom is so strictly observed that a second set of Gospels has been authorised, not to be read at the services, but to give preachers a larger scope in the choice of subjects for sermons. In the Ch. of England a larger liberty is allowed, though the advantage of choosing a text from the Scriptures appointed for the day and thus emphasising the appointed teaching of the day is generally recognised.

In the choice of a text for a sermon there are two methods which may be used. One is to decide upon a subject and then find a text which throws light upon it. The other is to take a text or passage of Scripture and proceed to unfold the meaning of it. Both methods are legitimate and may be used to produce useful sermons. Perhaps it is too often forgotten that a sermon should have an object as well as a subject or text. Its aim should be not merely to please or interest but to produce some particular result in the character and conduct of those to whom it is addressed. The preacher should ask himself before he prepares his sermon, What do I want to accomplish by means of the sermon that I am about to preach? There are three principles which should govern the choice of text or subject. First, it should be suitable for the occasion on which the sermon is to be preached. Next, it should meet the spiritual needs of the people to whom it is to be addressed. And, thirdly, it should be the expression of some truth or aspect of Christian truth by which the preacher is strongly held and influenced at the time of preaching. When these three conditions are fulfilled, the sermon will not be preached in vain. (See further, PREACHING.)—X2.

LUCIUS SMITH.

THANKSGIVING.—The element of T. is clearly evident in the PB. Following the Lit. there are 7 Ts. for use on special occasions, and one—the General T.—for use at any time by the discretion of the Minister. In this last there is an optional clause, by which anyone for whom public pr. has been requested may, in the presence of the whole congregation, give his own personal T. to Almighty God for blessings received in answer to such prayer. The remaining Ts. are not frequently used—at least in this country. Moreover, there are three Offices of T. pure and simple, viz.: (1) CHURCHING of Women, (2) T. after a Storm, (3) After Victory or Deliverance from an Enemy (the latter two in "Forms of Pr. to be used at SEA"). But almost every PB office has its distinct element of T. in psalmody, versicle, response, and prayer. Even the penitential Lit. has its Gloria Patri, and the Burial Office a noble T. in the first Pr. ("We give Thee hearty thanks," etc.). At the Savoy Conference the Puritans lodged an objection against the PB that it was defective in forms of Thanksgiving. To this the Bishops replied that it contained many Ts., Te Deum, Gloria Patri, etc., besides "occasional Thanksgivings after the Lit., of the frequency whereof themselves (i.e., the Puritans) elsewhere complain" (Cardwell, Conferences, pp. 344-5). This latter remark alludes to an "exception" of the Puritans in which they desired that the Gloria Patri be used only once at MP and EP respectively. It must also be remembered that there is likewise a Form of Pr. with T. to Almighty God for use upon the Anniversary of the Day of the Accession of the reigning Sovereign. THREE HOURS' SERVICE.—This name is commonly given to a Good Fr. Service of modern origin, introduced into the Ch. of Eng. some fifty years ago, and intended to commemorate the three hours' darkness at the crucifixion. There are slight variations in the exact form it takes in different places, but the following is a fairly typical order:—(a) Introduction (hymn, and a few prs. which may well be:—Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., the three Colls. for Good Fr.); (b) Meditation on the first word from the cross, comprising hymn, short address, silent pr., and Collect; (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), Similar Meditations on the remaining six words from the cross; (i) Conclusion (hymn, Coll., and Blessing). The Three Hours' Service is unquestionably lawful under the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act of 1872, provided: (1) the Colls. and Prs. are all taken from the PB; (2) all the other services for Good Fr. are used during the day; (3) the consent of the Ordinary is obtained. The popularity which this Service has attained proves that it has met a felt need, and the vivid way in which it pictures and brings home to the mind the scenes of the cross has undoubtedly done much good. But, if used, it should merely supplement the PB services for Good Fr., and never be allowed to oust or displace them.—G28, 89.

THRONE (BISHOP'S).—In the Jewish synagogue the officials and principal persons had special seats, the ἡγεμονικὸν mentioned in the NT (Mark 12 39, etc.), and this arrangement was transferred into the Christian Church. As early as the 3rd cent., if not earlier, the presbyters had their fixed seats in the upper part of the church, the bishop's seat (ἐπίθρονος, cathedra) being among them and distinguished from the rest by its linen covering (Tertullian, de Exhort. Cast. 7; Clemens Alex., Stromata vi. 13 106; Origen, in Matt. 16 22; Pontius, Vita Cyprian. 16; Didascalia Apostolorum 12). Seated in it, the bishop used to preach, and hence his chair came to be regarded as a symbol of his authority; so already in Cyprian, Ep. 3 (65) 1, etc. Very naturally, the church where the bishop's T. was permanently placed came to be called his cathedral, though not bef. the 10th cent. The chair of James the Lord's brother was, according to Eusebius (HE 7 19), preserved in his time in the church at Jerusalem. Originally, the clergy seats were of course movable. But very early the plan was adopted of making a fixed bench of wood or stone for the presbyters inside the round wall of the apse, the bishop's T. being in the middle, raised a little and exactly behind the altar. A good example of this arrangement may be seen in the Cathedral of Torcello, near Venice, and an ancient episcopal chair in its original position still exists in Norwich Cathedral. In the 13th cent. the altars were moved further eastward. This necessitated a re-arrangement of the clergy-seats, and they were accordingly placed below the altar in the style we are so familiar with in our cathedrals, the bishop's T. being to the east of the stalls, and usually on the south side. Fine examples of mediæval thrones may be seen in the Cathedrals of Durham, Exeter, Hereford and St. David's.

A bishop occupies his T. when present in his cathedral but not actually officiating, and from it pronounces the benediction. He may, however, require to be seated ceremonially during functions (e.g., Ordination and Confirmation) in which it is obviously impossible for him to use his T. And in this case it is usual to place near the Holy Table a chair (Rubrics of Ord.) facing westward. In many parish churches a chair is permanently placed on the north side of the SACRARIUM to be used by the bishop when he comes. In connection with this subject we cannot forbear mentioning the magnificent ivory chair of Abp. Maximianus preserved at Ravenna. (See DCA, arts. Cathedra and Throne.)—R5. J. W. TYRER.

TIARA.—The triple crown, worn by the Popes as a symbol of their sovereignty. The word is sometimes used as a synonym of MITRE.—R3. MORLEY STEVENSON.

TILES.—There are three kinds of T. in common use. (a) Roofing T., for which Broseley, in Shropshire, is one of the chief centres of manufacture. Pan T. should be avoided as being liable to let in the rain. (b) Wall T., for mural decoration. This art was brought to perfection in Damascus, Cairo and Moorish Spain. (c) Floor T. Majolica T. were much used in Italy three hundred years ago, but have gradually given place to others, as the majolica enamel was found to be too soft for footwear. The so-called "encaustic" variety is mostly used now in England as being more durable.—R6.

TIPPET.—Canon 58 of 1604 states: "It shall be lawful for such ministers as are not graduates to wear upon their surplices instead of hoods some decent tippet of black, so it be not silk"; and canon 74, enjoining decency of apparel upon the clergy, requires that dignitaries and graduates shall wear "gowns with standing collars and sleeves straight at the hands, or wide sleeves as is used at the universities, with hoods or tippets of silk or sarsenet, and square caps."

As to the meaning of the word T. there has been, especially of late years, considerable difference of opinion. There are many who identify it, save for difference in material and shape, with the ordinary graduate's hood, for which they declare it is but another name. Others maintain that by the word T. is meant what has long been known as the chaplain's or dignitary's scarf, and in the light of recent evidence¹ it is probable that the latter definition is the correct one. Certainly, until quite recently, in Ireland the scarf was always known as the T., and this definition still obtained until the middle of last cent. in certain parts of England. It is probable that the T. was evolved from the ancient ALMUCK, a vestment which covered the shoulders and included he hood, having long ends hanging down from the shoulders in front. These ends were known as the irispipium, and were generally for warmth, together with the hood, lined or edged with fur. Subsequently, the hood became separated from the pendent portion, which latter, however, was made sufficiently long and sufficiently wide to be used as a head covering in wet or cold weather, whence its present scarf-shaped appearance is without difficulty traced. The T. or scarf was worn by deacons and priests alike, and it is urged it should be worn by the deacon in the same manner as by the priest, and not over one shoulder only. There is no authority for confining the use of the T. to chaplains or dignitaries.

[The T. was part of the outdoor dress required by statute under Henry 8, and worn by custom over surplice as well as gown. Abp. Parker, on March 12th, 1566, referred to a rumour that "some of your preachers preached bef. the Q.'s Maj. without T. and had nothing said to them for it." About the same time Johnson wrote to Bp. Sandys asking why the T. was commanded and the stole forbidden, where the collocation suggests that the T. was already worn with the surplice.—G. H.]—R3. J. O. COOP.

TITHE.—The assignment of a tenth part of the produce of the ground to the service of religion was an obligation taken over by the Christian Church from the Old Covenant, though the custom was not merely Semitic (1 Macc. 11 35; Livy 5 31), and is ascribed in Genesis to pre-Mosaic times (14 20—cp. Heb. 7 2-10—and 28 22). Neglected under the kings, the duty was revived by Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31 5, 12, 19), and again enforced by Nehemiah (12 44). Malachi reproaches the Jews for robbing God in tithes and offerings (3 8). There is no law of tithes in Ezekiel, but their payment is prescribed in the Levitical code (Lev. 27 30-32, Num. 18 21; cp. Deut. 12 5-18, 26 12-14). The early Christian writers (e.g., St. Augustine and St. Jerome) base the duty of dedicating to the Lord at least the tenth part of a Christian's possessions rather on the analogy of the Levitical Law, the example of the patriarchs, and our Lord's injunction that the righteousness of His disciples should exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, than on any direct divine command. But we find the Council of Rouen, A.D. 630, affirming that "all the tithes of the earth belong to the Lord," and excommunicating those who refused, after three admonitions, to pay them.

In England, the 17th of the Articles delivered at the Legatine Councils held A.D. 785-787

quotes Lev. 27 30 and Malachi 3 10 as binding on Christians. In the 17th cent. Selden came into conflict with the ecclesiastical authorities by contesting the divine obligation of paying tithes. Perhaps such a duty may be regarded as analogous to the divine obligation of Sunday, for the principle of at least a fixed portion of men's goods and of their time being due to God has been usually held to be a permanent one. T. was "God's part," the "speciality of the Lord God," and its payment, at first enjoined and customary as a religious obligation, and afterwards claimable under spiritual censure under the law of the Church, finally passed, with the rest of that law, into the national jurisprudence of this and other Christian countries.

Ts. "were never the property of, or payable to, the State" (Selborne, Defence of the Ch. of Eng. p. 185); they were not a tax or impost, nor did they originate in some royal bounty, the recognition of the duty of payment being long anterior to any civil enforcement of it. In fact, till recently, process for recovery was of ecclesiastical cognisance only. Lord Selborne, who examines the historical facts at much length (Defence of Ch. of Eng. and Ancient Facts and Fictions), finds no enactment for the temporal enforcement of the right till the laws of Edgar (A.D. 970), afterwards confirmed by Cnut. The supposed donation of Ethelwulf, A.D. 855, by which that king "released the tenth part of his kingdom and offered it as a sacrifice on the Cross to the Triune God," he holds to have been only an enfranchisement of folcland, for pious purposes, from tribute or service, not a wholesale gift of a T. of the produce. Church revenues were originally lodged with the bishop, with a wide discretion of application, but at an early date the "baptismal" or mother churches, which were the local centres of religious ministrations and were usually conventual, obtained a right to the T. As the parochial system established itself, however, the right of the landowner to appropriate the T. arising from his lands to the parish church founded by him seems to have been recognised, and before the end of the 12th cent. the general title of the incumbent to the parochial T. was undisputed.

The idea of the continental quadripartite division of the T. (bishop, clergy, poor, church fabrics) having ever held good in England, or of a tripartite division (clergy, poor, fabrics), is disproved by Lord Selborne, though it is true that all Church property was called the "patrimony of the poor."

T., an incorporeal hereditament, payable of common right for "such things only as do yield a yearly increase by the act of God,"

3. Kind of Tithe. is, or was, of different natures: (i) prædial, arising from the ground itself, as grain, hay, lesser timber, flax, hops, roots, herbs, etc.; (ii) mixed, from things nourished by the ground, as young of beasts (not feræ naturæ nor fish), and of poultry, milk, cheese, eggs, honey, wool; (iii) personal, being net profits arising from human industry, e.g., mills, but not quarries. Ts. are also distinguished into (i) great, as corn, hay, timber; and (ii) small, viz., other prædials, and mixed and personal Tithe.

By the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 (6 and 7 Gul. IV, c. 71), there was substituted for all tithes paid in kind a corn-rent,

4. Tithe Commutation. permanent in quantity and payable twice a year (Jan. 1 and July 1), the sum varying with the value of the rent, which was fixed for each parish, failing voluntary agreement or an already existing modus decimandi, by compulsory award. The award was based on the clear average value of wheat, barley and oats during the septennium preceding 1836, viz., wheat 7s. 0½d. per bushel, barley 3s. 11½d., oats 2s. 9d., so that £100 commuted value corresponded to (omitting decimals) 94 bushels of wheat + 168 of barley + 242 of oats. Whatever sum in any future year would purchase that quantity of wheat, barley and oats at the average prices of the preceding seven years was to be the actual sum receivable for each £100 of commuted value.

The rent-charge, it will be noticed, is much more dependent on oats than on wheat, but the repeal of the Corn Laws has been fully felt by the tithe-owner. For hops, fruit and coppice-timber a different estimation was made (extraordinary T.). The net value of the rent-charge was to be liable to the same incumbrances and incidents to which the T. was liable before commutation, and continued to be treated as realty, but doubt has been felt whether the statute 4 Eliz., c. 2, intended unimprovable T. to be liable to poor rate. For recovery from the tithe-payer by suit in the spiritual court, 7 and 8 Gul. III, c. 6, and subsequent statutes have substituted a more summary process, and the Tithe Rent Charge Recovery Act of 1891 (54 Vict., c. 8) has made the landowner directly, but not personally, liable, after an expiry of three months and within two years, though the largeness or smallness of the rent-charge made no difference to the tenant, being adjusted with the rack-rent paid by him. Nor does it come from the pocket of the landlord, who purchased or inherited his land with this as a first charge on it. If alienated by law, it would be payable as at present, but to the State instead of the Church.—A6.

TITLE.—It is pointed out under ORDERS (HOLY), § 9, that from the beginning of the Christian Ch. one of the conditions precedent to ordination has been some sort of call or commission to work in a particular sphere. This principle is safeguarded in the Eng. Ch. in regard to Deacon's Orders by the requirement of a T., which is usually a Nomination to a particular parochial Curacy, but which may be a Fellowship of a College or a Mastership in a School, or some other charge involving cure of so ls. A statutory declaration as to the stipend must accompany the Nomination. It is, however, not necessary to be provided with a T. before applying to a Bp. to be accepted as a Candidate for Ordination.—A.

TOKEN, COMMUNION.—A small piece of metal, usually marked with some sacred device, given to intending communicants as a sign they are in full communion with the Ch., and returned by them during the HC Service. The custom of using Ts. prevailed formerly in Scotland both among Presbyterians and Episcopalians, but is now practically obsolete in the latter body. TONSURE.—The cutting off the hair of the head, wholly or in part, canonically required as a mark of the clerical or monastic life. [For legality of disuse, cp. TOUCHING FOR THE KING'S EVIL.—From at least the time of K. Henry VII till that of Q. Anne, a remarkable ceremony was in use for the supposed cure of scrofula, formerly known as The King's Evil, by royal touch. Lathbury (Hist. of Convocation 428) states that by tradition the sovereigns of England and of France had received this power of curing scrofula by their touch, and that it was derived from Edward the Confessor, to whom even the French King was indebted for the privilege. The ceremony was used as late as the coronation of Charles X at Rheims. In Q. Elizabeth's reign, Wm. Tooker published a work containing an account of cures which had been effected by means of the sovereign's touch (ib. 429). The efficacy of this method of healing rests on respectable evidence, and it was credited by such men as Heylyn, Collier, and Bp. Bull; but it was never authoritatively sanctioned by the Church, though the Service used was printed in certain PBs between the reign of Charles I and the year 1719 (Procter and Frere, New Hist. of PB 253). Over 92,000 persons are said to have been touched for the King's Evil between 1660 and 1682. The form of prayer, etc., is given in the Book of C.P. with Notes. ed. Stephens, Eccles. Hist. Soc., 2 990-1005.—$2, 59.

TRADITION.—The word παράδοσις, or tradition, is often used by our Lord in the Gospels and always condemned. The Pharisees asserted that God had given oral instruction to Moses over and above the written law and that this unwritten teaching had descended through Joshua, the prophets and the men of the great Synagogue to the rabbis of their own day. Such traditions were at once fictitious and mischievous. On the other hand, St. Paul (1 Cor. 11 2, 2 Thess. 2 15) uses the term to describe the teaching which he himself had imparted to his own converts. After the Apostolic age two kinds of tradition were distinguished: "written" tradition (ὑγραφοί) which was contained in the Bible, and "unwritten" (ἀγραφοί) which was not to be found there. Manifestly, "unwritten" tradition had, or might have had, decisive authority early in the 2nd cent., before the canon of the NT was fixed and while disciples of the Apostles still survived. In a sense the Gospels themselves are monuments of T., once oral and now written. It was also natural that special deference should be paid to churches of apostolic foundation.

Mischief, however, began when, without sufficient proof, doctrines were accepted as apostolic, simply because they were supposed to be held by the bishops of the Catholic world, the successors and spiritual heirs of the Apostles. Even then, with a certain measure of inconsistency, the greatest of the Fathers teach that all saving truth is given in Holy Scripture. "Do not believe me," says Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 4 17) to his Catechumens, "unless I prove what I say from Scripture." Athanasius (Adv. Gentes ad init.) and Augustine (De Doctr. 2 9) speak to the same effect. In the 16th cent. Christianity came to the parting of the ways. All the evangelical churches, our own included, refused to accept any doctrine as an article of faith, unless it could be found in or proved from the Bible. The Roman Church, on the contrary, declared at Trent that oral T., descending from Christ and His Apostles, but not committed to writing in the NT, was to be received with no less reverence and submission than the written word itself. Many of the Schoolmen, not to speak of the Fathers, would have rejected this definition, which indeed encountered violent opposition at the Council itself.

Practically it assumes that what is now taught universally under the Roman obedience must for that very reason have been taught always, i.e., from the beginning and without interruption.

Our Church, however, by no means refuses just respect to T. really ancient. Its writers prove the authority of the books in the Canon, not only by "the testimony of the Spirit" (see Burnet on Art. 6), but also by historical evidence. Special, though not absolute, deference is due to writers who lived near the Apostles' time and illustrate the beliefs and usages of the primitive Church. The Greek Fathers deserve a respectful hearing for this, among other reasons, that the language in which the NT is written was their mother-tongue. Also, it is a strong presumption against many Tridentine doctrines that they were unknown to antiquity. Again, while no one can adhere more loyally than Hooker does to Art. 6, he pleads (5 65) most reasonably for reverence "in things indifferent" to "ordinances made in the prime of Christian religion," and protests that "traditions ecclesiastical are not rudely and in gross to be shaken off, because the inventors of them were men." Here Hooker embodies the spirit which is characteristically Anglican and on the whole Lutheran.—U.

TRADITIONS OF THE CHURCH (Rites and Ceremonies).—The governing principle is laid down in Art. 20: "The

1. Principles. Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies . . . and yet it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written"; and again in Art. 34: "Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying." The last-named Art., in its earlier paragraphs, emphasises the fact that "at all times" such traditions "have been diverse," and censures those who through "private judgment," "openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church which be not repugnant to the Word of God and be ordained and approved by common authority."

The combined result of the above is that "the Church," which is for this purpose the particular or national Church (compare the Preface in the Confirmation Service), may order as it finds good the rites of public worship and the ceremonies to be used therein, subject to a twofold limitation: (1) nothing must be ordained contrary to Scripture, and (2) all things must be done to edifying (1 Cor. 14 26). This does not mean (as Puritans maintained) that every ceremony used in Divine worship must be warranted by Holy Writ. On the other hand, no Church is at liberty to abolish or change a rite or ceremony commanded in Holy Writ, such as Baptism in the threefold Name, or celebration of HC in the form instituted by our Lord.

There is, of course, some room for difference as to what is contrary to "Holy Writ," or again as to what makes for "edifying." Clearly the ordaining authority (the "particular" Church) is the judge of first instance; if its action stands in need of vindication as regards "edifying," the sense of the community must in the long run decide. As regards scriptural authority, the continuous practice of the PRIMITIVE CH. must have great weight. For example, the total silence of the earliest centuries as to any practice of the UNCTION of the sick by the presbyters of the Ch. justifies the Ch. of Eng. in refusing to regard James 5 14, 15 as a scriptural command instituting such a rite.

The general tendency of custom to spread, and of the custom of a more influential or energetic community to prevail against that of less favoured sections, has operated fully in the Christian Churches (see Frere, Hist. of BCP, c. 1). The diversity of order which existed in Western Christendom before the Reformation has now, within the Roman obedience, been replaced by practical uniformity: rubric, originally a mere guide to custom, has become obligatory law. Amongst ourselves, again, the rubrics of the PB have statutory authority, while in Ireland, Scotland, and America, they have the obligatory force of the domestic legislative power of the Churches concerned.

It follows that variety has tended to diminish in modern, as contrasted with ancient, times. In early Christian ages the varieties of local use were numerous and striking (see Augustine, Ep. 54; Socr., HE. 5 22).

St. Augustine distinguishes three classes of tradition as to rites and ceremonies. (1) Sacraments

4. St. Augustine's Classification. numero paucissima, observatione facillima, significatione præstantissima, such as Baptism and the Eucharist, "et si quid aliud in Scripturis canonicis commendatur" (i.e., outside the Mosaic ritual).

(2) Practices non scripta sed tradita of world-wide observance, which must be presumed to have the authority of the Apostles or of General Councils; such are the observance of Good Friday, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsunday, and anything else which can claim really universal observance.

(3) Other practices, which vary from place to place (such as daily or weekly Communion, etc.). Within the limits set by right faith and good morals, "Totum hoc genus rerum liberas habet observationes"; the wise Christian will conform, wherever he goes, to the local practice.

Our Arts. are in accord with the above principles. The liberty of "particular" churches is covered by (3), the standard of non-contrariety to Holy Writ by (1); while (2) lays down a principle not indeed directly asserted in Art. 34, but wholly in accord with its drift, viz., that there are some traditions so universal from the first that no particular Church would be justified in setting them aside, though they may lack express warrant in Scripture.

For principle (2), see the Preface to the PB, the Preface "of Ceremonies," and the 30th canon. On the general subject of this art., see Bp. Gibson of Gloucester on Arts. 20, 34; Duchesne, Origines du Culte Chrétien (Eng. trans., SPCK.); [and cp. RITUAL, and RITUAL LAW].—R. A. ROBERTSON.

TRANSEPT.—In the larger Roman basilicæ an open T. was placed between the nave and the apse, but the cruciform plan of our larger chs. is derived rather from the domed buildings of the Eastern Empire. The practical use of a T. in old English chs was to provide room for subsidiary altars, and our Ts. are often longer than the foreign examples, because it was not the Eng. fashion to build apses surrounded with chapels. Thus nearly all our Eng. Ts. open into a range of chapels on their eastern sides, and in most of our parochial Ts. indications will be found that they were once screened off to form chapels. The modern idea of using Ts. for congregational purposes, for which a T. is not well adapted, is quite contrary to the intention of the ancient builders.—R6. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

TRANSLATION is the term used to express the transfer of a bp. from one see to another, or of a dean from one deanery to another. T. of a bp. is most commonly to a metropolitan see.—T2.

G. HARFORD.

TRANSLATIONS OF THE PB.—See VERSIONS.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION is described by Art. 28 as "the change of the substance of Bread and Wine." This must still further be explained by reference to the definition of Trent (1551), which declares that "after the consecration of the Bread and Wine" in the Euch. "our Lord Jesus Christ true God and man is truly, really and substantially contained under the species of these sensible things." The Realist philosophy of the Middle Ages differentiated the thing in itself from the forms by which we perceive it and which were regarded as enclosing it, calling the former the substance and the latter its accidents. The theologians of the period, the Schoolmen, availed themselves of this terminology to represent to the imagination what was really a contradiction in terms, namely, that as a result of the Eucharistic consecration there was a transition or conversion of the substance of one thing into the substance of another, while the original accidents remained. Historically, the doctrine was the first movement of cultivated minds in the direction of substituting a spiritual conception of the Presence for the gross materialism which provoked the protest and procured the recantation of Berengar (1059). But, as adopted in the 16th cent. by the Council of Trent, it became the symbol of arrested development, and must be understood, as by the Reformers, in the light of the common teaching and practice of the time. As an abstract definition there is little to choose between the language of Trent and the Lutheran theory (Consubstantiation), the worst fault of either being that it involves a gratuitous assumption. The difference becomes at once apparent when we view the teaching of the Papal and the Evangelical Churches, not in abstract statement, but in that concrete presentation of it which is alone important. The spirit of the Anglican Articles and PB is only satisfied by a rejection not of T. as an exact theory, which is relatively unimportant, but of all theories employed to justify the use of the consecrated elements for purposes other than reception. Such uses imply a practical identification of the elements with the Person of Christ, who must necessarily be wherever His natural Flesh, or His natural Blood, is—a "broaden God," and this is essentially Transubstantiation.—hd.

J. G. SIMPSON.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF.—The Council of Trent met in 1545 and closed in 1563, but there were long interruptions. Thus, Sessions i-x were held (1545-1547) under Paul III; xi-xvi (1551-1552) under Julius III; xvii-xxv (1562-1563) under Pius IV. During Sessions ix and x the Council was transferred to Bologna.

Two great objects were held in view and were to a large extent attained. First, the discipline of the Church was reformed. Severe penalties were to be inflicted on unworthy priests. Lectures on Scripture were to be established in cathedral and collegiate churches and in monasteries. Each bishop was to set up a seminary and train young boys, by preference the children of the poor, for the priesthood. Clergymen with cure of souls were to preach on Sundays and festivals. Residence was to be strictly enforced and pluralities abolished. The preaching of indulgences by wandering ecclesiastics who in this manner collected alms (quaestores eleemosynarum) was done away with. Marriages were to be null and void, unless celebrated in presence of the parish-priest under whom one at least of the contracting parties was domiciled. The intrusion of monks and friars into the work of the diocese was regulated and restrained, and the power of bishops over regulars increased.

1. Reform of Discipline.

Next, the Council supplied the Roman Church with a statement of mediæval doctrine more or less complete and drawn up with

2. Fixation of Doctrine.

It corresponded to the formulation of Lutheran doctrine in the Confession of Augsburg, and was indeed occasioned by it. At the same time, it made all reconciliation with the Greek or with the Anglican and other reformed churches hopeless.

After recitation of the Nicene Creed with the Filioque clause it gave a list of canonical books, including seven which never had a place in the Hebrew list. Of all alike God is "the sole author"; they are authentic with "all their parts" as contained in the Latin Vulgate. The Church alone has the office of judge with regard to the sense of Scripture. Tradition is to be accepted with all the reverence due to the written word (cp. Art. 6). Whether Adam was created or placed after birth in original righteousness is left an open question. After the fall his free will subsisted, though weakened. Original sin is removed by Baptism, and involuntary concupiscence is not "truly and properly sin" in "the regenerate" (cp. Art. 9). The sinner is not justified by "faith alone" (Art. 11), but "by faith, hope and charity," i.e., by merit infused, not imputed, and good works done in a state of grace "merit eternal life."

Christ instituted Seven Sacraments (see Art. 25), of which three, Baptism, Confirmation, Order, imprint a "character" on the soul and cannot be repeated. A bishop only is the "ordinary minister" of Confirmation. The name and doctrine of transubstantiation are to be retained. Christ is received whole and entire under either species; the Church for wise reasons has withdrawn the cup from all except the celebrating priest, though the expediency of restoring it is left to the judgment of the Pope. Absolute adoration is due to the Sacrament, and the custom of carrying it in public procession is approved (cp. Art. 28). The Eucharist is not merely "a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving," as in our Communion office, but is "a propitiatory sacrifice for quick and dead" offered "on behalf of sins, penalties and satisfactions." Masses in which the priest alone communicates are lawful (see Arts. 30, 31).

Mortal sins after Baptism must by divine law be confessed to the priest. Contrition, confession and satisfaction constitute the matter, and priestly absolution the form, of the Sacrament. The meaning of contrition, sorrow from fear of torment or from love of God, is left undetermined. The priest does not merely declare but conveys pardon. Nor can mortal sin in the baptised be forgiven, unless the penitent receives priestly absolution at least in desire. Marriage being a sacrament confers grace, but those who deny that the unmarried state is more pleasing to God are anathematised.

The disciplinary decrees found ready acceptance in the Italian States and in the dominions of Maximilian II. Philip II received them, but "without prejudice to the royal authority." In France they met with long and obstinate opposition. The dogmatic decrees were recognised everywhere in the Roman obedience. For Greeks and Protestants they had no binding force whatsoever. How could they? Of the 270 prelates who voted in the Council 187 were Italians and 31 were Spaniards. There were but two German, one English, three Irish bishops present. No proposal could be made unless previously approved by the three Papal legates. Some of the Italian bishops were maintained at the Council at the expense of the Pope, who could send more of them at any time, if he wished to overpower opposition. The decrees had no validity till he sanctioned them, and, though a safe-conduct was offered to Protestant theologians, if they wished to attend the Council, they had no hope of obtaining any right to sit as members of the assembly.

There is a vast literature on the Council. Perhaps the most noteworthy books are Le Plat's Monumenta (1781-1787); Theiner's Acta (1874);

4. Literature. Sarpi's History of the Council (1619), to which the work of the Jesuit Pallavicino is in effect a reply. The Propaganda prints a cheap and convenient edition of the "canons and decrees."—A2, U4. W. E. ADDIS.

TRIFORIUM.—The name T. is applicable to any passage in the thickness of a wall, but especially to that above the main arches and below the clerestory of a large church. Early Benedictine churches had large triforial galleries above the aisles. At Winchester and St. Albans these opened into the nave with wide arches; later examples, such as Peterborough and Romsey, had these arches filled with rudimentary tracery. In subsequent churches the T. became a subordinate feature, except in a few cases, Westminster and Ely for instance, and in the latest Gothic it was often omitted altogether.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

TRINITY, DOCTRINE OF THE.—The word Trinity is not Biblical, and is first found in its Greek form (τριάς) in Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. 2 13), and a little later in the Latin of Tertullian (Adv. Prax. 3). But the idea is variously adumbrated in the OT. We have the conceptions of the "Spirit of the Lord," "The Angel of the Lord" (cp. esp. Gen. 18 1, 19 1, Mal. 3 1, Isa. 9 6 LXX), and such passages as Isa. 6 8, Num. 6 24-26: the personification of "Wisdom" (see Job. 28, Prov. 8, 9 1-12, Eccus. 24) and "the Word of the Lord" in the Sapiential Books of the OT and Apocrypha; and, above all, the idea of the Messiah.

In the NT, we find these Jewish conceptions transmuted by the spiritual experience of the first believers, who see in Jesus Christ the manifestation of the Father. They are monotheists by birth and conviction. And yet the personal distinction of the Son from the Father is borne in upon them; and the Personality of the Holy Spirit is implied in Christ's own teaching. Thus the Trinitarian belief centres in the foundation-truth of the Christian Faith, the Incarnation. (So Irenæus, Contr. Hæres. iv. 34 1: Quid igitur novi Dominus attulit veniens? Cognoscite quoniam omnem novitatem attulit, semetipsum afferens.) We search the NT in vain for a precise definition of the doctrine of the Trinity. Experience, the output of the Christian consciousness working upon revealed truths, is the raw material of doctrine: Creeds are the finished product. They do not innovate but interpret. By differentiation and selection their terminology was determined, so as to rule out all uncatholic doctrines.

This doctrine of the Trinity remains a mystery, which no human definition can compass.

In the PB we find a careful use of those terms which are applied, as St. Augustine says, "Non ut illud diceretur sed ne taceretur"¹ The best manual of instruction in the truth of the Three in One (stated simply in Art. 1) is the QUICUNQUE VULT.² Its terms, Person, Substance, begotten, proceeding, inferior, and the negations in which it abounds, may repel minds averse from metaphysics and from the study of the history of dogma. Throughout the QV. these terms have their developed significance: Person, answering to ὁμοούσιος in its later post-Nicene sense; Substance = οὐσία, essence, with no materialistic implication; in v. 31 the latter is used where nature might have been preferred (as in Art. 2, Coll. Christmas). These various terms serve as danger-signals. They warn against heresies, and these (in regard to the Trinity) are mainly of two kinds; for Tritheism is not a conscious heresy. (a) There is the Sabellian heresy, which taught three "modes" of the Divine existence; thus the Patripassians, such as Praxeas, were "Modalistic Monarchians"; and (b) Arianism, anticipated in a manner by the Adoptionists, such as Theodotus and Artemon. The Arian heresy involved the denial of the Person of the Holy Spirit, which was afterwards the heresy of Macedonius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and of the Pneumatomachi (A.D. 360). As regards the "double procession" of the Spirit, our Church in her PB symbolises with the whole Western Church (Art. 5, and Nicene Creed). That doctrine was never intended to posit two sources (ἀρχαί) of Deity. The Father is the "sole fount of Godhead." The Holy Spirit proceeds from (ἐκ) the Father through (διὰ) the Son (Bp. Gibson, Arts., p. 213).

We find prayer seldom addressed directly to the Son or to the Spirit: for the former, see Colls. 3 Advent, St. Stephen, 1 Lent; with certain petitions in the Lit., Pr. St. Chrysostom, and notably parts of Te Deum and Gloria in excelsis; for the latter, see VENI CREATOR, and petition in the Litany.

At the close of many Colls. there is an Ascription to the Trinity. When this is so, the Coll. is almost invariably connected with the HC or with a special grace (Bapt., Confirm., Ordination, Consecration episcopal or royal).

Not until man attained to a clearer conception of the Divine Personality did he set a true value on his own human personality. A bare monotheism leaves a gulf between man and God, which only the Love of God can bridge. The Deist places God over against the world; the Pantheist merges Him in the world. In the former case, the power and intelligence of the Deity are more easily proved than His moral attributes; in the latter case, as man is himself part of God and the divine principle includes the evil as well as the good of the world, no room is left either for human freedom or divine holiness.

But in the doctrine of the T. there is a synthesis of the truths of transcendence and immanence. (a) God is personal, but not a Person subject to the limitations of human personality; for that would imply limitation by other persons, and so the absolute self-existence of the Godhead would disappear. This difficulty is met by the consideration that God has relations within His own Being, which seem to constitute His moral nature. Fatherhood and Sonship are eternal distinctions within the Godhead. If it be asked, why a Trinity and not a Duality?, the answer is, that as there is a tri-unity in the human family, and as there is a threefold principle in the human spirit—will, reason and love (though the analogies are far from complete)—so in the Godhead it is, a priori, not unreasonable that its perfect Unity needs the Person of the Blessed Spirit, in whom Father and Son are One.¹

³ With the "monitory clauses" we are not here concerned.

This doctrine has its metaphysical and its religious value.

All knowledge is based on experience—the experience of the individual thinker, who is necessarily, by his very personality, insulated from other thinkers. And the question is: Can the mind transcend its own limits and conceive of universal truth? The answer of a modern Christian philosopher is this: "The multitude of persons implies the existence of a principle of unity more fundamental than that of personality, a unity in which all spirits have their home and bond of union." And again, "The Divine subject includes all other subjects. The human excludes"; "God is personal, but He is also more than personal"; "The ultimate unity, which is His, must be believed to be superpersonal."² [Cp. KNOWLEDGE.]

The spiritual instincts and desires of men find their satisfaction in the T. The conviction of sin craves Atonement and Justification; man's spiritual aspirations crave a sanctifying process; the intellect seeks enlightenment; the soul is athirst for the Living God. In the Catholic doctrine of God man finds his own personality emancipated.³—K² W. YORKE FAUSSET.

TRINITY SEASON (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR).

—The Colls., Epistles, and Gospels for the Trin. season are taken with 1. Introduction, scarcely any variation from the Comes of St. Jerome, and follow the use of Sarum throughout. In the Comes there are lessons for twenty-five Sundays after the Octave of Pentecost, though the Sar. Missal and our PB number them as after Trinity. The Roman rite contains only twenty-four Sundays after Pentecost. An inspection of the subsequent notes will show that the Colls., Epistles and Gospels according to the ancient order are all capable of easy harmonisation, while the lessons for the Roman rite during this season have been rearranged in such a manner as frequently to present no points of contact either with the Colls. or with one another. In the following notes the Lessons for the Sundays after Trin. have not been treated of. They were selected at the last revision of the Lectionary, and have no reference whatever to the Eucharistic Scriptures.

TRINITY SUNDAY (The Threefold Revelation).

The Octave of Pentecost has long been observed in honour of the Blessed Trinity, and there is reason for believing that the name Trin.

Sun. had its origin in England. The Eastern origin of the early British Ch. is one of the probabilities of Ch. history, and the naming of the Suns. of this period after Trin. instead of after Pentecost as among the Romans may be one of those local peculiarities observed by St. Augustine, which the Celtic bps. attributed to the primitive connection of their Ch. with St. John. The Collect was strangely altered in 1662. In the earlier PBs. the last clause ran:—"We beseech Thee that through the steadfastness of this faith we may evermore be defended from all adversitie."

It consists of thanksgiving for the true revelation, the unfolding of which has been commemorated during the previous six months, and of pr. for preservation in the true faith. The Epistle (Rev. 4) is a call to worship; it is the response of creation and humanity to God's revelation of Himself; and the Gospel (John 3 1-15), doubtless selected because each Person of the Trinity is mentioned in it, gives us the method and results of man's personal appropriation of the revelation of God in Jesus Christ.

Special Lessons are appointed for the whole day. The First Morning Lesson (Is. 6 1-10) describes a vision of the Divine Majesty, "high and lifted up." Its selection is probably due to the mistaken idea that the Ter-Sanctus contains some reference to the Holy Trinity. The First Evening Lesson (Gen. 18) is chosen because it contains the account of the visit of the mysterious three to Abraham. Few to-day would say they saw in that narrative foreshadowings of Trinitarian doctrine. The alternative Lesson (Gen. 1 1-2 3) is also selected with the idea that the language employed in 1 26, 27 implies a plurality of Persons. The Second Lessons (Rev. 1 1-8, Eph. 4 1-16, Matt. 3) are much more satisfactory. Modern critical scholarship forbids us to see Trinitarian doctrine in the OT; that doctrine, however, may be said to inspire the whole of the NT.

FIRST SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (The Life of Love).

This Sun. carries on the trend of thought suggested by Trin. Sun. God revealed as Love inspires in the Collect pr. for grace to please God by a life of love. The Epistle (1 John 4 7-21) defines what is meant by the keeping of God's Commandments under the Christian dispensation. It is the "love of Christian for Christian." Love is the test of life, and life is the secret of love. The Gospel (Luke 16 19-31) supplies a forceful contrast; the story of Dives teaches the sin of lovelessness.

SECOND SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Godly Fear).

The second Sun. moves in the same cycle of ideas. The 1st Sun. taught us of the perfect love that casts out fear, φάβος,

4. 2nd Sunday, the servile dread of punishment. To-day we pray for "steadfast fear and love." "Fear" here stands for εὐλάβεια, the reverence of sons, not the dread of slaves.

³ Cp. John 8 36, ὁ υἱὸς ἐλευθεροῦ.

The 1st Sun. laid stress on the outcome of grace in our hearts, viz., obedience in the form of love of the brethren. This week the thought is of the reverence we should feel for the character of Him, Who by being what He is inspires that love. The whole Sun. reminds us in the words of the Cat., "My duty towards God is to believe in Him, to fear Him, and to love Him," etc. The Collect was brought to its present shape in 1662. The earlier PBs. contained the following:—"Lord, make us to have a perpetual fear and love of Thy Holy Name, for Thou never failest to help and govern them whom Thou dost bring up in Thy steadfast love. Grant this," etc. This is a fairly literal rendering of the original Latin.

The Epistle (1 John 3 13-24) is very similar to last week's; it teaches us of the evidence of our Divine sonship found in those acts of righteousness which reflect the Divine character as revealed in Christ. The Gospel (Luke 14 16-24) again provides us with a contrast; the parable of the Great Supper tells us of those who had neither fear nor love for their Host.

THIRD SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Three Great Virtues).

The Epistle (1 Pet. 5 5-11) for the 3rd Sun. calls us to the exercise of three great Christian virtues: (1) Humility, (2) Vigilance,

5. 3rd Sunday. (3) Endurance. We may suggest that it has been put in its present place to round off as it were the thoughts suggested by Trin. Sun. and those immediately following it, for these three graces insisted on by St. Peter are the necessary complement in the Christian life of that spirit of love which looms so large in the mind of St. John. The Collect thanks God for the desire to pray; and in tune with the spirit of the Ep. humbly prays for defence in all danger and adversity. The Gospel (Luke 15 1-10—the Parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Piece of Money) is a message of comfort (the Coll. has prayed for our comforting). It brings before us the Rescuer and the rescued, and reminds us, on a day when we are thinking of pr. as God's gift, that His care for us always outruns our trust in Him; that notwithstanding our wilful wanderings He is ever on the search for us.

FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Mercy—God's and Man's).

The Collect addresses God as our Protector, and as the source of spiritual strength and holiness. It reminds us that we are on

6. 4th Sunday. a journey through this world, on which we are in danger of losing our way through the temptations and allurements of worldliness and sin, and prays that through the many-sided mercy of God, our Ruler and Guide, we may be enabled to make this journey so as at its end to attain the "things eternal." The parallelism of the Coll. is to be noted. God is addressed as the author of strength and holiness. The words remind us that we are soldiers in one aspect, saints in another. In the second clause, God's aid is sought as "our Ruler and Guide," where "ruler" equals "teacher," "trainer of saints," and "guide" points to the Captain of the Church militant. The "things eternal" of the last clause must not be restricted to future blessings. The Christian is made to "taste of the powers of the world to come" now. The Epistle (Rom. 8 18-23) is remarkably apposite; it is St. Paul's paean of thanksgiving over the hope of the new Creation when all things shall enjoy the glorious liberty of the Children of God. Of this hope we ourselves have received an earnest and the first fruits in the indwelling of the Spirit. The Gospel is from St. Luke (6 36-42). We have prayed for mercy in the Coll.; "be ye therefore merciful," says this passage. We are one day to be judged according to our conformity to the Divine pattern. As we must claim God's mercy then, let us reflect it now.

FIFTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (The Church's Mission and the World's Peace).

The Collect (from Leo Sacr.), like others of the same age, reflects "the disasters of the dying Western Empire"; it prays

7. 5th Sunday. for the peace of the world, that the Ch. may be left to enjoy its ordered round of praise and worship in tranquility. The Epistle (1 Pet. 3 8-15) is in patent connection with the Coll. St. Peter wrote, at a time when persecution was threatening the primitive Ch., to stablish and strengthen the minds of his readers. His recipe for the preservation of "godly quietness" is twofold. First, let the peace of the Ch. be unbroken within; let individual meekness and gentleness be the universal rule; secondly, quoting and paraphrasing Isaiah's words (8 13—see 1 Pet. 3 15 RV), "Let Christ be sanctified in their hearts as Lord." "If your chief concern is how the will and mind of Christ may be accomplished you will not fear any persecution." The Gospel (Luke 5 1-11—the account of the miracle of the miraculous draught of fishes) is obviously intended to illustrate the mission of the Ch. at work in the world, to the successful issue of which the maintenance of the world's peace is necessary.

SIXTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (God's Promises and Man's Duty).

The Collect carries on and develops the thoughts of the 4th Sun. aft. Trin. Its Invocation is founded on 1 Cor. 2 9 (cp.

8. 6th Sunday. Is. 64 4), and it prays that the love of God may be so poured in our hearts that by its inspiration we may be set irrevocably on the attainment of His wonderful promises. The Epistle (Rom. 6 3-11—note that to-day we begin the series of consecutive readings from St. Paul's Eps.) brings before us two of the good things which pass man's understanding:—union with Christ, participation in all the present benefits of His completed salvation (v. 5); the future life of bliss (v. 8). The Gospel (Matt. 5 20-26) brings us to the practical part of daily conduct. Those who pray for the love of God to be shed abroad in their hearts must be persons who live by the Laws of Love.

He who has caught the sense of the Divine compassion can never loathe the brother for whom Christ died.

SEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Religious Growth).

The Collect prays for our progress in the spiritual life under four stages:—(1) that the love of God's Character as revealed
8. 7th Sunday. to us in Christ ("Name") may be grafted in our hearts—it is not natural there; (2) that true religion may be increased in us, i.e., that our desire for knowledge of and union with God may grow; (3) that we may be nourished with all goodness, that is to say, with the free Grace and favour of God; (4) that we may be preserved in these things. The Epistle (Rom. 6 19-23) throws light on the Coll. in two particulars. In v. 22 the same figure of the growth of a plant to fruitfulness is employed; and in v. 19 the yielding of our members as servants unto righteousness is another way of expressing our being increased in true religion. The Gospel (Mark 8 1-9—the miracle of the feeding of the four thousand) illustrates the Coll. very fully. Our address to the Lord of all power and might is justified by this miracle over Nature, and its character—an exhibition of the compassion of Christ—adds meaning to the words "Author and Giver of all good things," while the thought of our being nourished with goodness is directly connected with the feeding of the multitude.

EIGHTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Spiritual Education).

The Collect is a pr. for our well-being, based upon a plea of the "never-failing" providence of God which controls and directs
10. 8th Sunday. all the forces, persons and things which shape our lives. It asks for the removal of hurtful things and for the granting of such as be profitable. The Epistle (Rom. 8 12-17) reminds us of the privileges and obligations of our spiritual Sonship. The God of Providence is "Abba, Father," the God whom we invoke in the Lord's Pr. The "things hurtful" of the Coll. are indicated by the "living after the flesh," and the "deeds of the body" of the Ep.; while the "things profitable" for us are indicated by the reference to the leading of the Spirit, and the imparting of the gift of Divine adoption. The Gospel (Matt. 7 13-21) is connected with Ep. and Coll. through v. 20, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Protestations of loyalty are tested by deeds of service.

NINTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Thoroughness).

The petition of the Collect for this Sun. is for the Gift of the Spirit so to act upon our spirits that we may be right both in motive 11. 9th Sunday. and in action. In the Epistle (1 Cor. 10 1-13) we pass from Rom. to 1. Cor. It brings before us the dangers of a divided half-hearted service. The Corinthians imagined that their possession of sacramental privilege was sufficient, and that they might be allowed a certain amount of moral laxity in view of the special temptations of their position. The Apostle's answer is, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." The connecting link with the Coll. is found in the word "always" of the latter. The lesson of the need for thoroughness in spiritual things receives further enforcement from the Gospel (Luke 16 1-9). The cleverness with which the unjust steward made provision for his own future is, mutatis mutandis, an example of that singleness of eye, clear-sightedness and directness of aim, which should characterise our stewardship of the gifts of God both temporal and spiritual.

TENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Spiritual Responsibility).

The main petition of the Collect for this Sun. is that our prs. may be so directed that we shall only ask for things pleasing to God.
12. 10th Sunday. and so invariably obtain our petitions. It is obviously connected with the Epistle (1 Cor. 12 1-11) which brings before us the subject of spiritual gifts. Two great lessons stand out:—(1) while all Christians are not to be alike, each one has his own measure of spiritual endowment; and (2) this is given us not simply for our own sake, but for others that they may profit withal. If the 9th Sun. aft. Trin. lays emphasis on our responsibility to God our Father, to whom we owe a perfect obedience, the 10th directs our thoughts to our responsibility to the Ch. The Gospel is St. Luke's (19 41-47) version of our Lord's triumphal entry, St. Matthew's account of which is read on the 1st Sun. in Adv. Its connection with Coll. and Ep. is twofold. (1) In the self-forgetfulness of Christ weeping over Jerusalem we have an illustration of the spirit underlying the exhortations of the Ep.; and (2) the words of Christ in v. 42, "the things which belong to thy peace," suggest some of the proper subjects for pr. of which we think in the Coll. Jerusalem stands for a warning as to the consequences of abusing spiritual privilege and responsibility. Christ may be in our midst, and we fail to recognise Him because we are intent on pleasing ourselves and not seeking to use our gifts so that others may profit.

ELEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Sovereign Grace).

The Collect is pr. to the All Gracious for His all-sufficing grace. Its Invocation is based upon God's omnipotence as most clearly 13. 11th Sunday. evidenced in His two-sided gift of sovereign grace, mercy towards sinners needing pardon, and pity towards His children needing sanctification. Note the splendid thought that these things are greater than any work of God in the merely "natural" sphere. The Petition closely reflects that of several of the previous Suns. (see more especially the 4th Sun. aft. Trin.). The Epistle is 1 Cor. 15 1-11. Of all instances of God's mercy and pity, Saul of Tarsus is one of the most conspicuous examples. The gospel of sovereign grace is the gospel of the Resurrection. The greatness of that miracle is at once the evidence of the magnitude of the evil to be remedied, and the warrant for the faith that looks for a perfect conquest of personal sinfulness and a full endowment for service. The Gospel (Luke 18 9-14—the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican) further illustrates the plea for God's mercy and pity. Our running in the way of God's commandments is not to be advanced as a plea for our being granted spiritual blessings, but is to be looked upon as the result of the exercise of God's sovereign grace.

TWELFTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Divine Abundance).

The Collect is a pr. for the mercy of God the Forgiver and the bounteous provision of God the Giver, based upon the contrast between His readiness to hear and ours to pray (see Is. 65 24). It may fairly be said to be one of the most complete and perfect of all the English Colls. The Epistle (2 Cor. 3 4-9) declares the superlative excellence of the Gospel as contrasted with the Mosaic dispensation. It is taken from St. Paul's vindication of his ministerial position. Its connection with the Coll. is not very obvious, but the last verse may be said to reflect the last clause of the Petition. The Gospel (Mark 7 31-37—the account of the healing of the man with an impediment in his speech) fits in beautifully with a Coll. which confesses in effect how stammering and halting we are in the exercise of the privileges of prayer.

THIRTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (True and Laudable Service).

The Collect was recast into its present form in 1662; the Edwardian PBs., following the original Latin, read in the last 15. 18th Sunday, clause, "That we may so run to Thy heavenly promises that we fail not finally to attain the same." The addition of the word "only" in the opening clause, "whose only gift," reflects the spirit of the Reformation (see Arts. 9 and 10). The Epistle (Gal. 3 16-22) may be connected with the thoughts of the Coll. thus. The heavenly promises for which we pray are as much ours by promise as were Abraham's. The faith which apprehends the promise apprehends also the Gift whereby "true and laudable service" can alone be rendered. The Gospel (Luke 10 23-27) interprets for us, by a practical example, what the service of God is. The priest and the Levite "serve" in one sense in the Temple, but their service is not "true and laudable," because it is not accompanied by graces of character and the readiness to make sacrifice of "self" in the service of others for God's sake.

FOURTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (The Supreme Test of Character).

The Collect (cp. Quinq.) is a pr. for the gift of growth in the three principal graces of Christian character, accompanied by and 16. 14th Sunday, resulting in such a love for the Divine will as shall secure for us the obtaining of the heavenly promises. The Epistle (Gal. 5 16-24) is the contrast between the fruits of the Spirit (the essential graces of the Christian character) and the works of the Law. Its connection with the Coll. is obvious. The Gospel (Luke 17 11-19—the miracle of the healing of the ten lepers) throws some light on the nature of those gifts for the increase of which we pray to-day. The ten lepers have faith and hope in Christ, sufficient at least to bring them to Him for healing. Yet all but one of them lack the spirit of love which would have brought them to His feet in adoring gratitude.

FIFTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Things Profitable to Salvation).

The Collect is a twofold pr.: (a) that the Ch. may be preserved in the position secured for her by her Lord's Atonement; and 17. 15th Sunday, (b) that her individual members, frail as all mortal things are frail, may be kept from things hurtful and led to things profitable to their final salvation. The Epistle (Gal. 6 11-18) is the solitary instance in this portion of the Ch.'s year of a departure from the use of Sar. by the Reformers. The old Ep. was Gal. 5 23-6 10. The reason for the change is hard to see, and the connection with the Coll. has been obscured. The Gospel (Matt. 6 24-34) exhorts us to exhibit two things profitable to salvation:—(a) singleness of devotion to God; (b) the contented, unfretful mind of the Christian.

SIXTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (The Cleansed Church).

The Collect, in its pr. for the cleansing and defence of the Ch., echoes the circumstances of the days of persecution. Ch. history 18. 16th Sunday, is the record of the answers to this pr. The Epistle (Eph. 3 13-21) illustrates the Coll. in a variety of ways:—(a) it provides us with a comment on the "continual pity" of the Coll. (see vv. 14, 15, RV m.); (b) we have here a catalogue of the perfections of the cleansed Ch., the result of her illumination by the ministry of the Spirit, the great spiritual process which culminates in the personal progressive knowledge of the love of Christ, which is for us the participation in the Pleroma, the fulness of the Divine perfection. The Gospel (Luke 7 11-17) is the narrative of the raising of the widow's son at Nain. He Who "had compassion" on the bereaved and widowed mother looks with the same eye of mercy on His "widowed Church."

SEVENTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Liberty through Bond-Service).

The Collect is a pr. for prevenient and co-operative grace, that we may be continually given to all good works. Its 19. 17th Sunday, special feature is the word for "continually"—in the original jugiter, i.e., perennially, a beautiful figure for God's grace welling up for us as a continual spring bringing life and beauty to our otherwise barren souls. Behind the thought of the freedom of grace lies the acknowledgement of our dependence on it, involving our being put in bondage to the Laws of Love (cp. "whose service is perfect freedom").

The Epistle (Eph. 4 1-6) is an account of the Christian "calling," and what it means to walk worthy of it, a definition in short of the being continually given "to all good works" of the Coll. The Gospel (Luke 14 1-11) is one of our Lord's many rebukes of Pharisaic self-assertion, and forms an illustration of Christian liberty to serve God as opportunity may offer.

EIGHTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (By Way of Remembrance).

The Collect was brought to its present shape in 1662. The earlier versions read, "O Lord, we beseech Thee, grant Thy people
20. 18th Sunday, grace to avoid the infections of the Devil, and with pure heart and mind to follow Thee the only God." As it now stands it is a petition for grace to fulfil the Bapt. vows of (a) renunciation and (b) obedience. The Gel. Sacr. in the last clause had puro corde; the Sar., following Greg., had pura mente; our translators have happily combined both words. The Epistle for this week (1 Cor. 1 4-8) breaks the course of consecutive readings from St. Paul's Eps. Evan Daniel, quoting Archbishop Whately, has an interesting note on the point. He suggests that in ancient times the Suns. following the Ember seasons had no special services of their own, but borrowed some of the order appointed for the Ordination which took place the previous day. It is difficult to feel convinced that this is an adequate account of the matter. It seems an adequate rationale of the day to suppose it is intended to revive in the Communicant the memory of his Bapt. and Confirm. In this light the Ep. puts a series of searching questions regarding our Christian progress, notably as to our waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is, comprehensively, the whole object of the Christian life. In the Gospel (Matt. 22 34-46) the connection of the purpose of the Christian life spoken of in Coll. and Ep. with the grace of God and the person of Christ is illustrated by the words of our Lord in His refutation of the unbelievers.

NINETEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Unto All Well-Pleasing).

The last clause of the Collect in the Edwardian PBs following the original Latin is as follows:

"Grant that the working of Thy
21. 19th Sunday, mercy may in all things direct and rule our hearts." Its present form is a pr. in the spirit of Rom. 8 8, 9, which verses will be found an adequate comment on it. The Epistle (Eph. 4 17-32—in the Sar. it was 4 23-28 only) is a portrait of the man who is well-pleasing to God, the man in whom all things are directed and ruled by the Holy Spirit. The Gospel (Matt. 9 1-8—the healing of the paralytic—one of the many instances of the triumph of faith) may be connected with Coll. and Ep. by remembering that it is only by the exercise of personal faith that the heart is made receptive of the Holy Spirit (cp. Heb. 11 6, "without faith it is impossible to please Him").

TWENTIETH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Joyfully Ready).

The Collect is of familiar cast (cp. 2nd Sun. in Lent). It is a pr. that we may be so protected as to be ever ready cheerfully to

22. 20th Sunday, accomplish the Divine will. The Epistle (Eph. 5 15-21) is obviously connected with the Coll. It calls the Christian to "redeem the time," "to claim the present for best uses," and that in three ways:—(a) by the positive apprehension of the Divine will through thoughtfulness, single-mindedness, and pr.; (b) by cultivation of Christian habits in social life; and (c) by the exercise of the spirit of mutual submission and subordination. The Gospel (Matt. 22 1-14—the parable of the marriage of the King's son) sets forth, by way of warning, the consequences of the sin of unreadiness proceeding from worldliness and self-righteousness.

TWENTY-FIRST SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (The Quiet Mind).

The Collect is a pr. for the gifts which ensure the quiet mind, viz., pardon and peace. The word "pardon" in the original

23. 21st Sunday, Latin is indulgentia, i.e., not the "remission of sins"—the "faithful people" have received this once and for all—but the compassion which deals tenderly with their failures and shortcomings. The whole Coll. is in close parallelism with that for the 16th Sun. after Trin. The Epistle (Eph. 6 10-20) teaches us how the Christian may preserve the "quiet mind" with which to serve God, viz., by waging a watchful warfare against his spiritual foes, armed as he is with the whole armour of God. The Gospel (John 4 46-54—the healing of the ruler's son at Capernaum) is another illustration of the power of faith. The "quiet mind" cannot be enjoyed by those who are out of touch with Christ.

TWENTY-SECOND SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Our Father's Family).

The Collect, as far as its opening clause is concerned, is a repetition of that for the 5th

Sun. aft. Epiph. Its petition is
24. 22nd Sunday, that the household of God may be protected from danger and preserved in both the motives and actions of true Christian religion. The Epistle (Phil. 1 3-11) is a picture of a typical Christian household, the Philippian Ch., with the duties and obligations of its members. They have a common fellowship of service (v. 7); they have a special character, evidenced by the love they bear one another (v. 9). The Gospel (Matt. 18 21-35) carries out the same thoughts by way of illustration. It teaches us God's attitude towards the members of His household, and their consequent attitude one to another (cp. Eph. 4 32, etc.).

TWENTY-THIRD SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Christian Citizenship).

The Collect invokes God in the words of Ps. 46 1. The citizens of the Heavenly Jerusalem address their Sovereign and claim His ear

25. 23rd Sunday, for their prs. The Epistle (Phil. 3 17-21) is an exh. to live in this world according to the powers and privilege of our heavenly citizenship. The Gospel (Matt. 22 13-22) reminds us that the heavenly citizen is still an inhabitant of earth. He has his duties to the State in which he lives. Let both Cæsar and God have their due.

TWENTY-FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Divine Absolution).

The Ch.'s round is drawing to its close. Fittingly to-day the thoughts of her members are directed in the Collect to the need for absolution, and deliverance from the "bands of those sins which by our frailty we have committed" (cp. the Pr. following the Ember Colls. in the Special Prayers and Thanksgivings). Our translation has missed an important point in the original Latin, which ran: "Absolve. . . a peccatorum nostrorum nexibus," i.e., from the debts which we have contracted. The Epistle (Col. 1 3-12) is a picture of the life of those so absolved and delivered, who go "from strength to strength" till everyone of them appears in Zion. The Gospel (Matt. 9 18-26), in the two miracles it contains, illustrates:—(a) the faith by which we lay hold of the power of Christ, (b) our need of "absolution," and (c) God's perennial willingness to meet our needs.

TWENTY-FIFTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY (Religious Enthusiasm).

To-day is called in the Sar. the Sun. next bef. Adv. In that book there was a rubric directing that, when there were more than twenty-five Suns. between Trin. and Adv., the Office for the 24th Sun. was to be repeated. The Roman rubric says "as for some Sun. aft. Epiph." The tone of to-day's services is that of Adv. rather than Trin. (see notes on 6th Sun. aft. Epiph.—EPIPHANY, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR, § 7). The Collect is a paraphrase rather than a translation of the original, and it is doubtful whether we have gained by the change. It strikes an Adv. note in the pr for the "plenteous reward" at the last Great Day. The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle (Jer. 23 5-8) looks away to the Divine hope. Egypt stands throughout Scripture for the state of unforgiven sin, from which the first Advent has set us free. As Israel experienced a second manifestation of the power of God to save, so shall we at the Second Coming of the Lord our Righteousness. The Gospel (John 6 5-14—the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand) is also appointed for Mid-Lent Sun. It stands here probably for two reasons:—(1) because of its exh. to "gather up the fragments that nothing be lost" now that the Ch.'s round is over; and (2) for the sake of the words with which it closes, "This is of a truth that Prophet that should come into the world."—640. H. M. SANDERS.

TRINITY SUNDAY.—See FESTIVAL, § 25; TRINITY SEASON (RATIONALE), § 2.

TROPE.—Under the Byzantine influence of the 8th and 9th cents. the custom arose in the West of adding various elaborate cadences to the traditional PLAINSONG melodies. These cadences—thoroughly Oriental in their profusion of notes—were not sung to the words of the Liturgy (which already had their own music) but were vocalised upon a vowel sound on any convenient syllable. The favourite position for the more ornate of these melodic accretions was at the end of the ALLELUIA sung in the Euch. Service immediately before the Gospel. Gradually, they found their way into certain parts of the Hour Services, and into almost every part of the choral texts of the Eucharist. The difficulty of committing them to memory led to the fitting out of these added melodies with words (see FARSE), and so popular did these interpolations become both in words and music that the early mediæval Ch. musicians directed their constructive energies into these parasitic growths upon the older liturgical melodies. The results seem almost incredible to those who live in an age of more or less ritual (if not of ceremonial) uniformity. The non-varying parts of the Liturgy, such as the Gloria in excelsis and Sanctus (and even, though this is very rare, the Credo), were farsed out with intercalated phrases which served to keep the liturgical forms open to receive the overflowing piety of an age only able to seek its means of expression through quasi-liturgical channels. The chief purpose of the Ts. in their relation to the invariable texts of the service seems to have been the infusion of thoughts connected with the feast or season for which they were written. One phrase of a troped Gloria in excelsis for the Christmas festival will suffice to explain the extent of these interpolations:—"Gloria in excelsis Deo. Et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis. Pax semper terna, Christus, illuxit, gloria tibi, Pater excelse. Laudamus te. Hymnum canentes hodie, quem terris angeli fuderunt Christo nascente. Benedicimus te. Natus est nobis hodie Salvator in Trinitate semper colendus. Adoramus te. . . . etc." It is obvious that such liturgical innovations could not be permanent, and that they contained within themselves the elements of their own decline. They soon began to decay, and by the 16th cent. had altogether disappeared with the exception of one important survival. The Alleluia T. had developed into a commonly received form termed SEQUENCE, and, by means of the composition of new Sequences in metrical form, hymnody, in the strict sense, had been imported into the Eucharist. (The service-book which contained the Ts. was called the TROPER.)—92. F. BURGESS.

TROPER.—(1) A book of tropi, or "tags of music" (H. Bradshaw), such as began to be introduced into the Mass about the 9th cent. (2) In the 12th cent. Tropes began to go out of fashion, and the surviving "farsed" Kyries were incorporated in the Graduale, etc. The name T. came to be subsequently applied to the Sequentiarius. The Winton T. has been edited for HBS (vol. 8) by Dr. Frere.—82.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

TRUTH.—(1) T. of being is simply that which any being (thing, person, idea, or force) really is, and is therefore identical with
1. Definition. reality. It is T. as God sees it.
(2) T. of expression, whether inwardly represented,¹ or exhibited in spoken or written word or other sensible form, is primarily (a) *logical*¹ T., that which conveys knowledge of reality; but in a loose sense we may ascribe (b) aesthetic T. to that which is fit, harmonious, beautiful; (c) practical T. to that which bears the test of experience; (d) ethical T. to that which honestly reproduces conviction.

The word is used in the PB in the first sense, of T. of being, in the "Black Rubric," "against the T. of Christ's natural body." Aesthetic

2. PB Usage.

T. is largely achieved in the PB, but is not named (see further, RITUAL). Logical T. is frequently referred to (e.g., Pr. St. Chrys.), usually as God's T., meaning T. of revelation. The maintenance of T. is among the concerns of magistrates, and of Parliament. T. is the end to which the Spirit leads (HC Pref. 4), the only road to unity and peace (Pr. for all . . . men; Coll. for St. Simon and St. Jude; Pr. for Ch. Mil. bis; Access. Pr. for Unity), in the light of which the Ch. must walk (Coll. St. Jn. Ev.), and of which the Incarnate Word is the supreme expression (Coll. St. Ph. and St. Jas.). In some of these instances T. of expression cannot be sharply distinguished from T. of being. Ethical T. is intended occasionally (Colls. for St. Jn. B., 1st S. aft. Easter, and Art. 39).

It is a remarkable fact that in Holy Scripture, which is only the Word of God because and so far as it contains and conveys T.

3. Truth and Religion.

("Thy Word is truth"), each Person of the Blessed Trinity is categorically identified with T. ("the God of truth, Ps. 31 6, Is. 65 16; "I am . . . the truth," Jn. 14 6; "the Spirit of truth," Jn. 14 17, 15 26, 16 13). And it is the unique heritage of T., of which the Ch. is the pillar and ground, the guardian and witness, which forms the fundamental constitutive element of the Christian religion. Other religions might borrow from the Christian Ch. her form of polity, her ritual and ceremonial practices, and even her ethical code, without ceasing to be distinct religions. But, if the adherents of any ethnic faith accept as T. the view of God manifested in Christ which is revealed by the Holy Spirit in the NT, they are already subjectively Christian, and qualified for admission to the Ch. Accordingly, it is asked at Bapt., "Wilt thou be baptised in this faith" (viz., in reliance on the T. of the Creed). The peculiar power to renounce sin and serve God which is the right of Christians is dependent upon the T. recorded in the Bible and transmitted by the Ch. This power of Christian T. arises from its nature, its sufficiency, its vitality and its authority.

T., being co-extensive with reality, has many realms, and these vary indefinitely in their value for the human spirit. Religious T. is of supreme value because by its very nature it appeals to what is highest, deepest, most central in man. By means of it he bases his life on the unchangeable and eternal. It offers him that satisfaction which can only be found in God. Religious T.

4. Its Nature.

can be put into philosophical or scientific form. But it does not pretend to meet all the insatiable questionings of philosophy or to rival the all-embracing range of the sciences. It is concerned only with God, with man as God's child and servant, and with the world as the scene of man's spiritual education. The Christian theologian, as such, whose business it is to elaborate religious T. logically, is simply a philosopher, who insists upon regarding reality in the light of that central chapter of human experience which is reflected in the NT, and who, further, fastens his attention upon those aspects of life which are most properly called religious and with which the Bible is mainly occupied (cp. RELIGION). Even within this special circle of ideas and institutions neither the Bible nor the Ch. claims completeness or finality of knowledge.

St. Paul and St. John, who lay most stress on knowledge and knowing, both imply definite limits.

"We have the mind of Christ," says 5. Its Incompleteness. the one, yet also "we know" (the whole only) from a part," "now I know from a part, then shall I know (with immediate intuition of the whole) even as I was known" (by God when he adopted me into His family). The other writes, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things," or "all know (the truth)." But he also admits that "now are we the sons of God, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be." Even the Master Himself expressly disclaimed knowledge of "that day or that hour." The astronomer may predict eclipses long before, but the Christian teacher, to whom it is not given "to know the times or the seasons," confesses that the T. revealed to him is but an illuminated area which shades off on all sides into darkness.

So it is not the present perfection of T. as we can grasp or express it which the Ch. of Eng. claims, but its sufficiency for man's everlasting salvation. Art. 6, "of the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation," makes this clear, and Ord. 2 Q. 2 expressly requires candidates for the priesthood to acknowledge this principle. This position does not debar the Ch. from dogmatic formulation of religious T., for Art. 8 asserts that "the three Creeds . . . ought thoroughly to be received and believed." Yet the safeguarding clause ("for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture") restricts the office of the Creeds to the authoritative selection and expression of Scriptural T. Nor are theologians and teachers hindered, either in their efforts to interpret, connect and render in modern speech revealed truths, or in any further endeavours they may make to relate biblical truths to T. as ascertained from other realms of God's self-manifestation. They are only forbidden, as officers of the Ch., to exaggerate the importance of any extra-biblical discoveries of Truth.

The sufficiency implied by this doctrine is, of course, no bare minimum of T., such as will just maintain spiritual existence at a low ebb. The vitality of Christian T. is the ground of its sufficiency.

7. Its Vitality.

This T. is such that, when received into the heart and adopted as the basis of conduct, it inspires a life which is felt to be satisfying in proportion to the thoroughness of its reception. The most startling metaphors are used to describe this quality. He, who was "dead in trespasses and sins," through the acceptance of this T. "is passed from death unto life." The slaves of sin are set free by the mere message of deliverance that comes to them from their Unseen Rescuer. This vital quality is closely connected with the concrete form in which Christian T. must be presented if it is to quicken the conscience and impart new life to the soul. The God who saves is a living Being, under whose interested eye the long procession of history has been passing, to whom every actor on its moving scene has been mysteriously akin, and from whom each has drawn strength momentarily to serve or to oppose Him. Life can only come from life. And it is the fact that in SCRIPTURE T. is so continually presented as taught or grasped in some concrete and individual form by prophet, hero, apostle, or humble believer, which makes the Bible par excellence the book of life, and authenticates it as containing the word of Truth.

Lastly, Christian T. carries with it unique authority. (1) No other body of religious convictions has gone through such thorough testing, or produced such fruits of character and conduct.

8. Its Authority.

Its AUTHORITY is not, indeed, coercive or irresistible; but, where its appeal is not neutralised by serious admixture of error or glaring inconsistency of life, it is ample to create in any reverent mind a sense of obligation, first to consider, and then to make trial of, T. so commended. (2) It progressively imparts, to those who both believe it and act upon it, an inner certitude which difficulties may distress and perplex, but which doubts cannot destroy.

The ascertainment of Christian T. is discussed under KNOWLEDGE, LEARNING, STUDY, and its formulation under DOCTRINE. No difficulty arises, except the difficulty of the search, in regard to regions not covered by authorised or accepted definitions. And large areas of solid, fruit-bearing ground are being quietly and gradually reclaimed from the receding ocean of ignorance by the organised research of highly trained scholars in many fields of inquiry. Every page of this work would yield proof of this claim. But in two cases a complication arises.

8. Its Expression.

(1) Some expansion of knowledge may modify a statement accepted as true on the express or virtual authority of the Ch. If a particular Ch. is committed like the Roman Ch. to the doctrine of its own infallibility, the strain of the situation is serious. Otherwise re-statement is all that is needed, and if it can be done quietly it is of course all the better.¹

(2) Words may change their meanings, and the old expression may no longer convey the old T. There, again, re-statement is the most effective remedy, though explanation must serve till the more thorough treatment can be applied.

A last question arises in regard to what is known as the doctrine of reserve. It is possible to press this principle so far as to condone equivocation and other grades of falsehood. But parents and teachers, preachers and writers, have to consider, not merely what is true, but what is edifying. Food for the mind is like food for the body: one man's meat is another's poison. The two determining factors are the characters and attainments of the hearers on the one side, and on the other the amount of confidence which the speaker has aroused. There will be many true statements which it will never be expedient to make in a mixed congregation of all classes and ages. There will be others which only a trusted and well-known voice can safely introduce. Religion is a very conservative force, and its mental embodiments need careful handling. But, while it is needful to be tender with souls, and sympathetic in dealing with strange husks of tradition protecting rich kernels of T., it is also necessary to supply judicious guidance to those for whom the kernel of T. will shrivel unless they be helped to shed the cracked and ragged husks that half conceal and half reveal it. It is equally important that those who have not by patient study earned the right to speak with knowledge should on matters of controversy speak with especial modesty or be silent.—U. G. HARFORD.

TUNICLE.—A vestment similar in form, shape and colour to the DALMATIC, but considerably less elaborate. In churches where the vestments are in use the T. is worn by the Epistoler, or Sub-deacon. The First PB of Edward VI directs the assistant ministers at the HC to wear albs with Tunicles. The T. is one of the Ornaments of the Minister declared by the Privy Council to be illegal.—R3. J. O. COOP.

TURNING TO LORD'S TABLE AND PEOPLE.

—The PB is not explicit in its directions as to the position and posture of the priest at every part of the services—it being no doubt understood that prevailing practice would serve as a guide in all cases where directions were not given. He is directed in the Communion Service to turn to the people at (a) the Recital of the Ten Commandments, (b) the Absol.; and common sense, apart from rubrics, would indicate that he should take the same position relatively to the people at the Epistle and Gospel, the reading of the Addresses, the giving out of notices, the delivery of the Sermon, etc.

The only other directions as to the position of the officiating priest are: (a) in the rubric at the beginning of the service—the Priest standing at the North side of the Table; (b) bef. the Coll. for the King—the Priest standing as before; (c) aft. the Sermon—then shall the Priest return to the Lord's Table; (d) aft. the Sursum Corda—then shall the Priest turn to the Lord's Table; (e) bef. the Pr. of Humble Access—... the Priest, kneeling down at the Lord's Table; (f) bef. the Pr. of Consecration—when the Priest, standing before the Table, hath so ordered the Bread and Wine that he may with the more readiness and decency break the Bread before the people and take the Cup into his hands, he shall say the Prayer of Consecration as followeth; (g) aft. the Communion of the People—when all have communicated, the Minister shall return to the Lord's Table.

All these indicate a position of the Officiant which was certainly not toward the people, and on this ground they were objected to by the Puritans. At the Savoy Conference, when the Rubrics of the Communion Service were under discussion, the Presbyterian Divines suggested that "the minister turning himself to the people is most convenient throughout the whole ministration," as he was directed to do at the Absolution. The bishops disagreed with this, and answered that "When he speaks to them, as in Lessons, Absol. and Benedictions, it is convenient that he turn to them. When he speaks for them to God, it is fit that they should all" (both Minister and People) "turn another way as the ancient Church ever did" (Cardwell, Conf., pp. 320, 353—quoted in Lincoln Judgment). This lays down the principle that in the Godward part of the Service, as we may call it, when the Priest is presenting the pra. and offerings of the people, and pleading with and for them the Sacrifice of the Death of Christ, he should stand, as it were, at the head of those for whom he ministers, turning with them towards the Altar whereat he is making the Memorial of Christ's Death. Thus Solomon stood or knelt bef. the altar of the Lord in offering his Pr. at the Dedication of the Temple; and afterwards arose, apparently turning to the people to bless them (1 Kings 8 22, 54, 55). [For the Priest's position with regard to the Holy Table, see arts. EAST, TURNING TO; EASTWARD POSITION; POSITION AND POSTURE OF MINISTER AND PEOPLE.]—R2.

E. HOBSON.

UNCONSECRATED BUILDINGS AND GROUND.—An incumbent may perform divine service in any consecrated building within his benefice, but not elsewhere in the parish without the bishop's licence. If so authorised, he may (18-9 Vict., c. 86¹) conduct a "congregation or assembly for religious worship" anywhere in the parish. In unconsecrated buildings the services may be read by any layman. In a consecrated building there seems to be no law against a layman reading Morning and Evening Prayer and the Litany in the absence of an ordained minister, or officiating at services additional to those required by law. The bp. cannot compel an incumbent to perform the Burial Service on unconsecrated ground, even when it is the entrance to a vault in consecrated ground.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

UNCTION.

I. THE RITE OF UNCTION.

The present art. is confined to U. of the sick (for other kinds, see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 23; cp. RITUAL, § 39, 16, n. 3; CHRISM; CORONATION), but deals incidentally with healing ministries. The question of U. is one of practical urgency. The Peculiar People and others are fatally neglecting the sick in reliance on Jas. 5 14. On the other hand, the use of Extreme Unction operates as a sentence of death upon average people.¹

In the passage cited we have to do with the most soberly practical writer in the NT, Jas. 5 14. St. James was a Jewish Christian who kept up his Jewish traditions more fully than most of his fellow-believers. He would then be well aware that it was the practice amongst the Jews, as Dr. Schechter has shown, to call for the holiest Rabbis and ask them to go to a sick neighbour's house and pray over him. Moreover, the use of oil for medicinal purposes was not only common in antiquity and recommended in all the ancient medical treatises, but was well known and frequently practised amongst the Jews, which was natural enough, Palestine being the land of the olive. Instances are familiar in the NT, as in the treatment of the injured traveller by the good Samaritan (Lk. 10 34, where Harnack refutes Wellhausen's assertion, that no physician would prescribe a mixture of oil and wine, by an apt quotation from Hippocrates), and in the Mission of the Twelve who "anointed with oil them that were sick" (Mk. 6 13). Again the verb used for anoint is ἀλείφειν, which, as Trench points out (and Grimm-Thayer endorses his view), is the word for mundane and profane use, as for festal purposes, healing, or embalming, χρίειν being reserved for sacred or mystical use. The presumption is that the prescription of oil here is not for sacramental efficacy or with a merely symbolic reference, but that it is mentioned as a household remedy of well-nigh universal application and sure to be at hand.

Why then call for the Elders of the Ch. and say nothing of the physician? Probably, because the physician likely to be available would be a mixture of medical practitioner and sorcerer, more of a medicine man than a physician, and likely to rely more upon charms and incantations of a heathenish or superstitious sort than upon sound remedies or wholesome treatment.

So a reasonable interpretation of the reference to the element of oil finds in it a mention of the use of means. Pray and work.

Moreover, this view is more or less borne out by the restriction of the use of oil in the earlier cents. of the Christian Ch. to

2. Ch. Unctio. bodily healing and not to sacramental effect upon the soul.

Knowing points out that at first laymen and women could bless the oil, and that, even when priests and bps. blessed it, all could apply it; that in the 10th cent. the administration began to be restricted to the priest, this naturally suggesting that it bore more on the soul's than the body's state; and that it is not till the 12th cent. that we find the term Extreme U., or the practice of restricting it to those on the edge of death.

In the First PB of Edw. VI anointing is permitted, if the sick person desire it, and the prayer includes prominently a petition for bodily healing, though the symbolic inference is also admitted (see RITUAL, N5^o, n. 1). No formula for benediction of the oil was preserved, as the Romanists complained in 1551. (Further, see Puller, The Anointing of the Sick, SPCK, 1904, and the Report of Com. of Lamb. Conf. of 1908, p. 137, V.) A growing body of opinion is in favour of the authoritative, though permissive, revival of the rite. But many still fear the risk of superstition.

Two further points emerge clearly enough.

- (1) St. James categorically asserts that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick."

3. Value of Prayer.

I will assume that the words mean what they seem to mean, and that they do not, as RC. commentators make them out, refer to spiritual salvation, but to bodily healing. Neither may the absence of expressed qualification be pressed.

What is clear is that St. James teaches that a primary and normal element in the treatment of the sick with a view to their healing was believing prayer under the authority of the ministry of the Ch. The faith naturally would include that of the sick person and his family, for they are to "call for the Elders of the Church."

- (2) The connection of sin with sickness and of healing with forgiveness is brought out in the following verses, Jas. 5 15, 16, on mutual confession and its relation to healing and forgiveness. The idea is as clear as can be. Health and bodily harmony are not to be expected while there is indulged unconfessed and unforgiven sin. Body and soul are intimately interdependent. Moreover the influence of prayer is cumulative. A circle of praying people has more power than an individual. Mutual confidence and sincerity, entire openness towards God and one another, will be powerful factors in augmenting the efficacy of prayer.

4. Sickness and Sin.

II. THE HEALING MINISTRY OF THE CHURCH.

Every one of the Gospels contains ample evidence that, in the tradition reproduced by them, healing miracles were frequent and prominent elements in the saving ministry of our Lord.

5. Gifts of Healing.

The proof given by Hobart, and lately sifted and endorsed by Harnack, that St. Luke was a physician, lends an added evidential weight to his testimony. These cures also, unless we are to throw over the narratives altogether, at least included cases of serious organic disease, and are represented as being instantaneous.

Similar instances are narrated also in Acts, some occurring in the sections in which St. Luke was an actor and an eye-witness. Again, St. Paul testifies to "gifts of healings" as familiar marks of the mighty working of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12 28).

In the early Ch. there is still no lack of evidence that a healing ministry of the Ch. was a great reality. The supplementer of St. Mark records the instruction of the Risen Christ, "they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover," without betraying any consciousness that the experience of his day had falsified the direction.

Harnack, in his Expansion of Christianity, has devoted a considerable section to this department of the Ch.'s work, considered as one of the causes of its victory, and especially to the conflict with the demons. From Justin Martyr and Irenæus to Athanasius and Augustine these claims continue to be made.

In after ages the belief in Divine healing in answer to prayer retreated more into the background. The secularising of the Ch., the abuses arising from the order of exorcists, the rise of theories of sickness as Divine discipline—these with other causes tended to the obscuring of the subject.

Individuals, however, like Francis of Assisi, Luther, George Fox, and John Wesley, from time to time are recorded to have shown an exceptional control over conditions of ill-health, and in connection with revivals of religion recoveries of health have been not infrequently found. So, too, in the backwaters of religion, where superstition held sway, a continuous stream of marvels has been flowing on, Lourdes being only a striking recent instance.

And now within the last half cent. the whole subject has been thrust into new importance by the extraordinary developments of Faith Healing, Mind Cure, and Christian Science, mostly in America, but also in this country and elsewhere. These need to be judged by principles.

III. PRINCIPLES OF HEALING.

For a long time among the more thoughtful and independent members of the medical profession the close connection of mind and body has been seen to have many consequences in the treatment of disease. Dr. Radcliffe, after whom the Oxford Infirmary was named, is an instance of such men at the beginning of the 18th century.

At the root of all healing it is now agreed that we must place what, after being accepted from the ancients, was ridiculed for a time, and is now reinstated as the prime vera causa of cures, the vis medicatrix naturæ, the healing power resident in the very nature of living tissue. Symptoms of disease are now admitted to be the marks of the reaction of the system against some entering evil.

In the next place comes the regulation of a patient's condition apart from express remedies, so that this internal healing power may work best. Rest, quiet, sleep, warmth, simplicity of diet are common in such regulations.

In the third place come positive means of all kinds. They may be material, as in the prescription of drugs, or they may be mental, as the cheery encouraging manner and speech of a wise doctor, but their action is the same. They stimulate some healthful bodily reaction.

The phenomena of hypnotism show what can be done by working upon what is called the sub-conscious region of the mind. But the effects

7. Systems of Suggestion. of direct suggestion are almost as remarkable. And the fact that Christian Science and kindred systems have such an extraordinary vogue proves that they must meet some need. There must be something in them which effects cures. But the lamentable instances of failure to cure prove equally clearly that their claims are extravagant and their sweeping assertions false, while an examination of their supposed metaphysical basis finds it honeycombed with contradictions and absurdities.

In part, the success of these systems may be attributed to the simple regimen which they prescribe. In part, it must be set down to the release afforded from the annoyance of medicine-administering and treatment, together with the freeing of the mind from fear and worries. But, at least in part, the effect of Christian Science and Mind Cure must be ascribed to their lofty spiritual teaching, with its realisation of the unseen, and the prominence which it gives to the empire of spirit. Devotees, especially women, who by temperament are commonly indifferent to logic, and who comprise the immense majority both of the patients and practitioners, swallow undigested the crude metaphysics offered to them, but feed upon the old truths, newly applied and regarded as alive and effective, which are mixed up with the errors.

It is to be noticed that the cures are not only of nervous functional disorders, but of organic disease. But it is shrewdly pointed out by a well-informed American writer, Dr. Buckley, in the Century, 1887, that Christian Science is more successful than Faith Healing, because the latter must act instantaneously or not at all, while the former is a gradual process, and so leaves room for the steady working of the vis medicatrix naturae, which is only hindered by the reaction of disappointment where an instantaneous cure is expected but not experienced.

The way then seems open to the Christian Ch. to take up systematically and with an open mind this work of healing, in full

8. Conclusion. alliance with the best medical skill and the most approved psychological teaching. Such efforts are now beginning to be made both in America and England. But the movement is generally considered to be too much in the experimental stage for any endorsement by authority of particular methods.

UNIFORMITY, ACTS OF.—See ACTS OF UNIFORMITY.

UNIGENITUS, BULL OF.—In 1694 Quesnel, a learned and devoted priest, published a NT in French with "Moral Reflections." In 1713, 101 propositions from this book were condemned by Clement XI. Most of these propositions are concerned with the Augustinian doctrine of grace and free-will, but some are of more general interest, e.g., the bull condemns Quesnel's statement that all Christians should read the Bible. Cardinal Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, long refused to accept the "Constitution"; so did fourteen other bishops, as well as the universities of Paris, Rheims and Nantes. These "Appellants" referred the questions in dispute to the Pope "better informed," or to a General Council.—A.T. W. E. ADDIS.

UNION OF BENEFICES.—Outside the Metropolis Bs. can be united only under the provisions of the Pluralities Acts (1 & 2 Vict., c. 106, amended by 4 & 5 Vict., c. 39, s. 23; 13 & 14 Vict., c. 98; and 34 & 35 Vict., c. 90).

1. Outside the Metropolis. The Bs. proposed to be united must be in the same parish or contiguous to each other, and their aggregate population must not exceed 1,500. Proceedings are initiated by the Bp. of the Diocese and carried to completion by the Abp. of the province, with the consent of the patron or patrons of the Bs. affected, the final sanctioning authority being an Order of the Crown in Council ratifying the Abp.'s Scheme.

The Order for union may contain directions for regulating the course and succession in which the patrons, if there be more than one, shall present or nominate to the United B., and for determining the diocese in which the United B. shall be, if the separate Bs. are not in the same diocese. If the United Bs. are not all held by the same incumbent, upon the voidance of any one of them the patron of the vacant B. is bound to present the incumbent of the other or one of the other Bs., and the union takes effect so soon as all the separate Bs. are held by one and the same incumbent.

The Scheme of Union may declare one of the churches (if there be more than one) to be the parish church, and the Bp. has power to direct subsequently the use to be made of any other church; but there is no power to sell any church or the site thereof.

Contiguous Bs. in London (i.e., the Metropolis or Metropolitan District) can also be united under the Union of Benefices Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict., c. 142, slightly amended by 61 & 62 Vict., c. 23),

2. Within the Metropolis. without regard to the aggregate population of the Bs. to be united. The initiation of a scheme of union under this Act rests with the Bp., by whom a Commission of Inquiry is issued addressed to five persons consisting of three beneficed clergymen (two nominated by the Bp. and one by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, or, if in the City of Westminster, by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster) and two lay churchmen nominated by the Corporation of London (or, if not in the City of London, by the vestries of the parishes affected respectively). If these Inquiry Commissioners deem a union expedient they also recommend the terms of union. The Bp. then causes proposals to be prepared based upon those terms. The proposals are sent to the Eccles. Commissioners, but first they require the consent of the patrons of the Bs. affected and of the vestries of the respective parishes. It is then for the Eccles. Commissioners to prepare a scheme for submission to H.M. in Council for effecting the union.

Provision may be made for (inter alia): (a) the diversion of unnecessarily large revenues or endowments to making provision for other Bs. within the Metropolis or in the vicinity thereof; (b) the exchange of patronage with a view to facilitating unions; (c) the removal of a ch. or parsonage house and the sale of the site and materials and ground annexed thereto (provided that the erection of another ch. or parsonage in the Metropolis or the vicinity thereof forms part of the scheme).

To the sale of the site of a ch., it is necessary to obtain the consents of the Abp., the Bp., the Archdeacon and the Home Secretary; the churchyard cannot be sold under this Act.—ra. R. W. FOWELL.

UNITED PARISH.—After a union of benefices, the Ps. of which the united benefice consists become united for eccles. purposes only, and continue distinct as to all secular rates, taxes, charges, duties and privileges. In the case of benefices within the Metropolis, if there is only one church within the UP., such ch. becomes the ch. of the UP., but, if more than one, the Scheme of Union determines which ch. shall be the ch. of the UP. The parishioners of the Ps. united continue to elect churchwardens for each P., and the churchwardens so elected are together the churchwardens of the UP.; and the Vestries of the UP. together form one joint Vestry for eccles. purposes (23 & 24 Vict., c. 142, s. 18 & 20).

In the case of benefices outside the Metropolis, if there are more chs. than one within the limits of the UP., the Bp. of the Diocese may decree that one ch. shall be the P. ch. of the united benefice. The persons residing within the limits of the UP. have then the same rights and privileges, and are subject to the same obligations in relation to such ch., as if that ch. had always existed as their P. ch. (34 & 35 Vict., c. 90).—A7. R. W. FOWELL.

UNITY is one of the "notes" of the CHURCH (see § 4). So far as it involves visible U., it is obviously lacking in our day. In the PB, however, where it is four times prayed for (Pr. "all conditions"; Coll. St. Simon and St. Jude; Pr. Ch. Militant; Pr. for U. in Access.), it is in each case asked in dependence upon a prior need, TRUTH. See further, REUNION, and, for internal U., CHRISTIAN RELIGION, § 22.—K2. G. HARFORD.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.—(1) Did our Lord celebrate His Last Supper at the normal canonical time for the Paschal meal

according to Jewish tradition? or, (2) Did He anticipate the canonical time, and celebrate His Passover the evening before?¹ These questions have arisen from a presumed difficulty in harmonising statements in St. John's Gospel with those in the Synoptics as to the order of events during the last days of Holy Week. The controversy which these questions have raised is of ancient date, and it is not probable that it will be ever finally settled; we have no concern with it here, except so far as it has affected the practice of the Church, and this has happened in the following way. In the first case (1), our Lord must certainly have consecrated UB. when instituting the Euch. In the second case (2), He would probably have used Leavened Bread. Naturally, it has been thought important that the Church should follow our Lord's example in this matter. We have no certain indication as to the practice of the Church in apostolic times, but, if 1 Cor. 5, 7, 8 has a Euch. reference, it would undoubtedly point to the use of UB. Oriental canonists would answer question (2) in the affirmative, and hence the Eastern Churches, as a rule, consecrate Leavened Bread. It seems doubtful whether UB. were exclusively used in the Western Church from the first; but it is certain that by the 8th or 9th cents. the use of UB. only was universal in the West.

Our own Rubric on the nature of the Euch. Bread is ambiguous; its form is permissive and not prescriptive; it allows something ("it shall suffice") but does not enjoin it; it permits an exception to what had been up to the framing of the Rubric the traditional rule, and that rule had been the use of UB. The permission to use ordinary bread does not abolish the lawfulness of the previous custom, but modifies its binding character. This was the opinion of Abp. Temple expressed in a letter written in 1898,¹ notwithstanding the fact that in 1871 the Privy Council had decided against the lawfulness of using Unleavened Bread.

[We feel somewhat doubtful as to the correctness of the writer's interpretation of the Rubric; cp. RITUAL, H5⁶, n. ||.]

USAGE.—The English Church in 1549 explained her position in reference to the changes in her Service-books that were then being made, that the wilful and contemptuous breaking of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God.

It was recognised that many were addicted to their old customs and that others would innovate all things. In explaining therefore the reason why some ceremonies were retained and others rejected, it was stated that, when the old may well be used, then men cannot reasonably reprove the old only for their age without bewraying of their own folly. If they declare themselves studious of unity and concord, then they will reverence ceremonies that are edifying for their antiquity. The English Church was not a new religious body, but a continuation under new conditions of the same corporate religious life that had prevailed for centuries in the land. So throughout the PB it is at once evident that the customs that had prevailed were still largely to be observed. The rubrics would need to have been much fuller and more explicit, had it been otherwise. The MP and EP were to be said in the accustomed place, and the chancels to remain, as they had done in times past. On the first day of Lent, the Lit. being ended according to the accustomed manner, the Communion Office was to be used, and a portion of it said where they were accustomed to say the Lit. In the Churching of Women the women were to come to the church at the usual time, and kneel down in some convenient place as had been accustomed, and they were to make afterwards their accustomed offerings. Parishioners were yearly at Easter to reckon with the Rector, Vicar or Curate, and pay to them all ecclesiastical duties accustomedly due.

It is thus clear that U. and custom were intended to regulate much of the ceremonial of the Church, U. which at that time was recognised as well known and therefore quite unnecessary to specify definitely.

It is probable that some penitential Office or Lit., together with the Brev. Office of Prime or Tierce, was wont to be recited publicly by the curate bef. he celebrated the parish Mass on Sunday mornings. So it was that after his visitation of the province of York in 1571-2 Abp. Grindal ordered that Mattins on Sunday was to be followed immediately and without any break by the Lit. and the HC. and this U. of the Church once more defined by the order of the Abp. was recognised and lawfully authorised by Convocation and Parliament, when in 1662, after the Savoy Conference, the Lit. was ordered to be said on Sundays "after Morning Prayer." Abp. Grindal's order was certainly not the enactment of a new ceremony, but merely a definition of Usage.

In order that U. may become legal, it must have a definite origin and an observance time out of mind; but it is doubtful whether it could ever be regarded as such in reference to the Ceremonies of the Church in face of a definite rubric authorised by the Church and by Parliament. On the other hand, it is questionable whether a rubric which has fallen into desuetude, such as that expressly enjoining that the names of would-be communicants are to be signified to the curate some time the day before, could be again generally enforced, even though the authority is so express and undoubted. Yet the neglect of the daily offices and of the observance of saints' days in the 18th cent. and in the early part of the 19th cent. has not prevailed to authorise their non-observance, and the improvement of the U. may in time make other rubrics now ignored become once more observed according to their original purpose. USE.—I. SARUM USE. In the interval between Abps. Lanfranc and Anselm Wm.

1. Origin and
"Uses."

Rufus sanctioned charters for establishment of three cathedral chapters, by (1) T. of Bayeux, Abp. of York in Northumbria, (2) Remigius of Fécamp, Bp. of Lincoln in Mercia, whose see had been previously at Dorchester, and (3) Osmund of Seez, Bp. of Old Sarum in Wessex. These three, who had been attached to the Conqueror, were together among the royal counsellors in this joint policy, and they witnessed one another's charters.

It is noteworthy that nearly 450 years later Cranmer mentions (Pref. to First PB) that "heretofore there hath been great diversitie in saying and synging in churches within this realme: some following Salsbury use . . . some the use . . . of Yorke, and some of Lincolne" (others "Herford," i.e., "Hereford," or "Bangor").

The Use of a cathedral church deals with three principal parts of cathedral life. (a) The constitution to settle and define the relations of Bishop, Dean, Officers, Canons, Vicars, etc. St. Osmund had taken over the new see of (Old) Sarum from Herman who at Ramsbury had had no Canons. Osmund granted a charter of endowment, and also in 1091, the year before the cathedral at Old Sarum was consecrated, imported the main features of his model chapter from Bayeux. (b) Ritual, or words and order of services. As these at first were contained in Sacramentaries, Mass-books, Gospel-books, Legenda, etc., with little or no provision in the nature of rubrics, there were required further—(c) Ceremonial directions as to the manner of performing the service. In St. Osmund's time some of the Ordines Romani may have been found generally sufficient. Later mediæval tradition, however, ascribed to him the composition of a fuller Ordinale for local use, in accordance with the liberal policy ascribed to St. Gregory.

The "illustrious and most famous of the churches of the West," the Cathedral of Salisbury, owed its reputation (1) to the constitution with which St. Osmund endowed it, (2) to the liturgical genius of its second founder Ric. Poore (dean, 1198-1215, at Old Sarum; and, after two years at Chichester, Bp. of Sarum), in whose time it was transferred to the new city. The traditions of his Ordinale were kept up by such experts as succentor J. de Middleton (c. 1279), who furnished certified answers on perplexing points of ceremonial, and precentor Welewyk, who (c. 1342) framed an Ordinale which, with that of "Edmund," came to be cited as authoritative in distant East Anglia. The Bishops of Salisbury from the 13th cent. to the present day have taken official rank as precentors, chanters, or rulers of the choir, in the episcopal chapter of the province of Canterbury, when the primate performs a solemn celebration. In days gone by, when St. Osmund's successors visited Rome, they enjoyed the dignity and title of the Pope's master of the ceremonies in his chapel.

From about 1150 the Sar. constitution or customs were introduced at Glasgow. In 1212 Moray followed suit, and in Bp. R. Poore's time the Bishops of St. David's and Dunkeld and Abp. of Dublin adopted St. Osmund's model as "explained" in Poore's custom-book. In 1220 the Dean of Sar. began to inquire whether churches and chapels in his jurisdiction had an Ordinale, and the new cathedral at Salisbury was hardly ready for use when a college in Winton diocese (Merewell) was singing service "after Sarebiry." Within three years of the first opening of Salisbury Lady Chapel Pope Greg. IX had ascertained that already more than half the Church of England was copying Osmund's institutions. About 1290 the dean complained that the Gradual at Ruscomb and the Manual at Sandhurst Chapels were "non de usu Sarum." Several dioceses maintained their independence, absolutely, or in some particulars, from the growing influence of Sar. use. In 1376 the parishioners of St. Giles, Cripplegate, applied to the Pope for leave to replace their worn-out books of diocesan use by those of Sarum. In 1415 the use of St. Paul's was discontinued by authority in London. A few years later the Sarum Ordinale was enjoined as a guide for Lichfield choir.

When influential personages introduced Sar. use within the dioceses of Canterbury and Winchester, or carried it with them to their private chapels beyond the seas, and when Wykehamists and Etonians familiarised thereto were scattered over all parts of England, in the 15th cent., it followed naturally that, after the art of printing was invented, the call for books of this use was louder than the demand for any other. Those who were responsible for the printed books of Sar. use adopted the prudent and liberal policy of catering in them for the most pressing local requirements of other dioceses: Ely, Lichfield, Lincoln, London, and Norwich in the matter of SYNODAL feasts, and for weekly COMMEMORATIONS in the case of the first-named. In March, 1542, Abp. Cranmer in the Convocation of Canterbury prescribed the Sar. Brev. for the clergy of the Southern province. The effect of this would be to discontinue the printing of the Hereford Brev. and to forbid recitation of the Divine Office from the old editions or such MSS. as survived, while the decree would leave the Hereford Missals and could not interfere with any of the books of York use.

About a year later Cranmer was trying his hand at a reformed Latin Brev., and the printing of the Lit. and suffrages in English

5. Abolition of the Sarum Use.

In 1544 was followed by Compline sung in English in the Chapel Royal on Easter Monday, 1547, and by the Communion Book a twelvemonth later, till the 1st Act of Uniformity, Jan. 22, 1549, established one use for the whole Church of England, and on Christmas Day the bishops were required to call in the old books of "Sarum, Lincoln, York or any other private use." After the accession of Q. Mary, Sar. and York books were reprinted, and those uses were revived until the 3rd Act of Uniformity, April 28, 1559, prescribed the use of the Book of Common Prayer on or before June 24 following.

Dr. J. W. Legg, in his introduction to the Westminster Mass-Book (HBS) of c. 1370, has traced the

6. Sources of the Sarum Use.

Missals of the Sar. type in MS. as far back as that of the Rawlinson collection (Liturg. c. 1) in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, which was written for the monastic church of St. Albans, c. 1095-1105, by one of the younger contemporaries of St. Osmund, and those of Paul, Abbot of St. Albans, who (c. 1080) had been furnished with Missals and other service-books by Lanfranc himself, as has been recorded by the monk William of Malmesbury. This historian, while usually uncomplimentary towards secular clergy, spoke in high terms of the Canons of Salisbury and of their great bishop, who worked in the scriptorium, writing, illuminating and binding volumes with his own hand. It is remarkable that the principal Mass-books in which Dr. Legg has detected Sar. peculiarities are those of the Benedictine churches of Abingdon, Westminster, Norwich and Tewkesbury. In the absence of direct testimony it is difficult to ascribe the common origin of the rite (where it diverges from the Gregorian) to a date subsequent to Anselm, and we rather incline to find in it the hand of his predecessor Lanfranc using his influence to commend the result of the labours of St. Osmund. The monasteries usually adopted the use of the diocese in which they were situated, and application had to be made to the Pope for exemption from this rule, even for a time and under such special circumstances as long familiarity with some other use or the ownership of other books. Such indults were granted by Clement VI in 1344, by Boniface IX in 1391-98, and others. Abingdon itself was in the old diocese of Salisbury; St. Albans indeed belonged to Lincoln; Tewkesbury was in the diocese of Worcester, which, with that of Norwich (which would perhaps prefer to be independent of its neighbour Lincoln, as Westminster from London), adopted what was virtually the Sar. use, and their monasteries conformed so far as the altar service of the Mass is concerned. For the daily and nightly office of divine service the religious orders were bound to use the Psalter and Brev. of their order.

Thus the Sar. Missal, as we know it in the printed editions c. 1486-1557, may be considered to have had for its exemplar a MS. copy which had taken form after the delayed canonisation of St. Osmund in 1456-7.

7. Historical and other Data.

translation of St. Frideswide (Feb. 11), of St. Erkenwald (Apr. 30—a London synodal feast, 1386), or of St. Nicholas (May 9), or of St. Chad (Sunday before Ascension), is simply natural, seeing that they were not kept by any service in the Salisbury Missal, nor with the exception of St. Erkenwald was provision made for their observance even in the Brev. of this use. The earliest printed Sar. calendars, however, place the feasts of the Transfiguration and the Most Holy Name in their proper position in August, but the latter, though it had received papal sanction in 1457, and had been commended by Bp. Halam as early as 1411, did not get promoted out of the appendix of votive masses in the Missal until after 1494. The rubrics contain a few indulgences and some references to circumstances of an historical nature. The latest is of the time of K. Edward III, when Pope Urban V (c. 1362-70) granted 100 days' pardon to the faithful hearing the mass of Corpus Christi festival. This rubric, however, does not occur in the earliest printed editions. The earliest of such privileged devotions in the Missal (viz., three Prayers of the Passion) occurs at the end of the book, just before the Kyries, in ed. 1498, and is of interest as being ascribed to Innocent III, contemporary with R. Poore's tenure of the deanery at Old Sarum. The mass of the Five Wounds ("Humiliavit") is ascribed to St. Boniface (presumably the VIIIth Pope of that name, 1294-1303), and a constitution ("Debitum") on second marriages to John XXII; and his emissary in 1321, J. Haystede, is named. To the same Pope is ascribed the grant of 300 days' indulgence in connection with the Gospel of the Passion according to St. John ("Apprehendit"). The name of another of the Popes at Avignon, Clement VI, is associated with the mass "Recordare" for use in time of general mortality. He consecrated the river Rhone into which corpses were cast in the fatal year 1348 when Petrarch's Laura, among two-thirds of the population, perished of the Black Death. The cultus of SS. Erasmus, Raphael, Gabriel, and some others, became fairly general about the middle of the 15th cent., and was introduced by way of supplementary offices appended to the later MSS. and earlier editions.

About 1223, while the new cathedral church was in building, Bp. Poore issued a constitution requiring all priests in his diocese to procure the Canon of the Mass corrected according to the custom of Sarum. Though the earliest Sarum Missal (Rylands, late Ld. Crawford, which Dr. Legg has undertaken to edit) is believed to be not much earlier than 1264, there is a Graduale of the earlier part of the 13th cent. now made accessible in facsimile by the Plain-song and Mediæval Music Society, but the Ordinary in this MS. is defective. Dr. Legg in his Tracts on the Mass gives texts of c. 1264 and 1320, showing simpler rubrics than those of the incunabula and the 15th cent. MSS., which, as he points out, were brought into harmony with the ceremonial recognised by W. de Pagula (c. 1330) and J. de Burgo (c. 1385) in Oculus Sacerdotis and Pupilla Oculi. Some passages in the rubric of the printed Missale (e.g. cols. 586-9) may be recognised as imported from the Sarum Consuetudinary (pp. 21-2, 68).

When we turn to the rubrics of the printed Sarum Brev. (1475-1557) we find that they are largely drawn from the Sarum "Customary" of the 14th cent. (c. 1330-1390), and, to a smaller extent, from the "Consuetudinary" of the 13th cent. (c. 1210-1270). A touch of local colour may be noticed in the reference to processions after evensong to the altar of St. Martin, and others which were in Salisbury Cathedral (see indexes to Brev. Sar., fasc. i and iii; Frere's Use of Sarum, i; Wordsworth's Salisbury Processions). The index festivitatum in Brev. Sarum, iii, pp. (xxix)-xxxvii, may help to show differences in the Sanctorale, etc., of the principal English uses. Many points of variation between York and Sarum Antiphons, Capitula, Hymns, Responsds and Versicles are shown in their indexes, ib., iii, pp. lxii-cxvi—also the Sequences, in the same vol., pp. xcii-cxix (introductory pages). The Lectionaries and the Collect-books of the respective uses still require investigation. Dr. Legg has pointed out the most characteristic peculiarities in the Dedication Office Ps., the Grail (especially its last versicles) particularly in the Epiphany season and Eastertide, the Tracts and Colls. for Easter Even, the Lessons, Tracts and Colls. on Whitsun Eve, and the Secrets and Post-communions of the Mass, particularly in the Advent Ember days, the 3rd and subsequent Sundays in Lent, the "still days" of Holy Week, Tu. and Fri. in Easter week, Low Sunday, 4th Sun. aft. Easter, Sun. aft. Ascension Day, Whitsun Eve, Monday, Tuesday, etc., 1st, 3rd, and 5th Sundays aft. Trinity, and the Ember days in September (Westminster Mass Book 3 1428-1427); and the services of Palin Sunday, Easter Even and Candlemas (ib., pp. 1426-34).

The CANON of the Mass (14th cent.) appears to have been practically identical in all English uses, and thus formed a bond of union throughout the country as well as for the Western Church in general. Its rubrics differed in various places, there having been practically none in the Sacramentaries which introduced the rite into this country. Only the private devotions of the celebrant developed to some extent in various places. The Prs. at the vesting of the priest and those said during the singing of Gloria in excelsis are noticeable in the use of Westminster.

II. USES OTHER THAN SARUM. Lyndwode the canonist, who had been preb. of Salisbury and

Hereford and archdeacon in the dioceses of Sar. and Lincoln, laid down as a general principle of Canon Law, in 1433, that the Use of the Metropolitan Church (e.g., Canterbury or York) is to be followed throughout the entire province; but he added that the Use of Sar. had been so long, and so properly, in vogue, that it had a prescription of long-continued and reasonable authority, and he pointed out that it might be fairly maintained that almost the entire province of Canterbury followed it, and that Abp. Chichele in 1416 had virtually prescribed or recognised that use as authoritative in a constitution after the battle of Agincourt. Papal briefs and indults, however, from the latter part of the 13th cent., if not earlier, testify to the existence of a doctrine generally received in England after the country became completely Christian and the church and nation co-extensive, that the unit of the jus liturgicum was the diocese rather than the province; and this principle was to some extent respected for the Roman Communion in the case of Brevs., when, in 1568, the bull Quod a nobis, abolishing Card. QUIGNON'S BREVIARY, secured for the time the continuance of those local uses which could already prove a prescription of two centuries.

In theory, and not infrequently in practice, an English diocesan bishop took counsel with his senatus, the clergy of his cathedral centre (who were, originally, the mission-priests of Christianity for the diocese, and, in Norman times, the clergy of his city), and he promulgated in chapter such directions as he determined to make with regard to rites or ceremonies. The records of the diocese of Exeter under J. de Grandisson (A.D. 1337, 1339, 1366), T. de Brantingham (1391), and Hugh Oldham (1505), show us the bp. reducing to writing the previously unwritten customs of his cathedral in an Ordinale, securing the approval of his chapter, prescribing it for the use of the college which he founds at Ottery; also prescribing a Legenda to his cathedral church. Ordinale and Legenda in this case were both drawn largely from those of Salisbury. A successor, later in the cent., desires the dean and chapter to adopt the Sar. Ordinale. After some delay, and evident reluctance on the part of dean Ralph Tregression, they accept it with the condition that they keep their local non-Sarum saints' day services, and on the understanding that the archbishop, W. Courtney, concurs in their disuse of the old Ordinale which he had approved, and to which they are at present bound by oath. A year later (Dec., 1392) the dean directed the vicars to say the pr. for the King and for peace in Ember weeks, vigils and ordinary days, "as they are done in other cathedral churches of the province of Canterbury regulated by Sarum use" (Chapter Acts). What had been accepted by the chapter soon came to be required by Ordinaries in their visitations of "peculiarities" or of parish churches. Only here and there stalwarts like Clement Maydestone, who had left Winchester College to "enter religion" at Isleworth, and who became a Brigittine nuns' deacon (though in priests' orders) at Syon convent, were found to protest that only the rubrics of "general" import concerned even those clerks who were bound to follow Sar. use, but that the Ordinale contained various rules of a purely "ceremonial" character which were applicable to the cathedral body of Salisbury in particular on account of its statutes and local circumstances (Defensorium Directorii, c. 1440).

has proved that the rite of the York Missal belonged to a distinct class or family from that of Sar. (which stands practically alone), and that the northern province had a rite closely akin to that of the Gregorian Sacramentary which was introduced in early times at St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and by Leofric at Crediton and Exeter, and of which traces appeared even at Sherborne monastery in the diocese of Sar. in the 15th cent., as well as at Whitby, and which prevailed among the Dominicans (from 1254; ed. 1504), the Cistercians (ed. 1617), and at the Charterhouse (ed. 1541), and in such Norman dioceses as Bayeux, Rouen, and Coutances. All these may be assigned to the "Gregorian" or non-Sarum group (Westminster Missal 3 1418). York maintained its own Brev. printed in 1493, 1507, 1517, 1526, 1533, its Pye in 1509, its Manuale in 1509 and c. 1530, its Processional in 1530, and its Psalter and Hymnal in 1503 and other years, and Hymnal in 1517, as well as Horae, or Prymer for the laity, in 1517 and 1538, besides its Missal in 1509 and 1533. The Antiphoner also can be traced in MS. These books were retained until the policy of imposing one book "according to the use of the Church of England" was established in 1549. The York Brev., Processional and Horae were reprinted in the reign of Q. Mary, but a York Missal of her reign does not seem to be extant. The weekly COMMEMORATIONS at York were those of S. William, SS. Peter and Paul, and Our Lady ("de domina").

At Durham the cathedral was served (except for a period ended in 1083) by Benedictine monks, who

12. Use at Durham. had a Mass-book of Gregorian type akin to that of York, along with their own ceremonial and the monastic Breviary. It is remarkable that when Bp. Antony de Bek, a Lincolnshire baron, gave statutes to the collegiate churches of Chester-le-street in 1286 and St. Andrew's, Bishop Auckland, in 1292, he ordered the modum psallendi of York or Salisbury. When one of his successors, T. Longley, in 1428, gave new statutes to Bishop Auckland, he repeated the direction more explicitly, that all masses and canonical hours were to be performed in their choir "with note according to the use of York or Sarum"; only ordering that Mattins should be said in the morning instead of at midnight.

It may be mentioned here that in 1504 a Psalter was printed which appended York hymns to those which belonged to Sar. use.

The old diocese of Lincoln, extending from the Humber to the Thames and containing eight arch-

14. Lincoln Use. deaconries, was the largest in England.

Before Remigius removed the bishop's stool from Dorchester, near Oxford, on its south border, the Mercian and Mid-Anglian diocese had been in extent comparable to that of one of the missionary bishops of more recent times. It had included ten counties: viz., Herts, Lincoln, Northampton, Rutland, Leicester, Hunts, Beds, Bucks, Oxon, and (till 1109) Cambs. Its northern part owed its conversion to Paulinus, and attempts were made by his successors, in 1092 and 1175, to include Lincoln in the northern province. The spirit of independence which resented such claims may be sufficient to account in part for the maintenance of a use of Lincoln distinct from that of York. The existence of such a use is attested by its mention in the Pref. to the PB in Jan., 1549, and by the order of K. Edw. VI on Dec. 25th, that "all antiphoners missales . . . and ordinales after the uses of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private use" should be brought in by clergy and churchwardens. In 1542 the Convocation of Canterbury decided that the use of the Sar. Brev. should be incumbent on clergy of the southern province. Of a MS. missal (15th cent.) claiming explicitly in its rubric to be secundum usum Lincoln (Bodl. Tanner, iv. f. 133; MS. 9824) only three leaves are preserved. This solitary fragment is sufficiently unlike the Sar. Mass-book to be interesting. Dr. Legg finds that the (Advent) Mass lessons do not correspond entirely with those of any English use which he has seen. There is no evidence that any book of Lincoln use was ever printed. We read of a MS. Antiphoner of Lincoln use having been adapted to Sar. usage for Louth Church some time before 1486. A similar, or in part a reverse, process may have been gone through in the case of an extant MS. Missal (Brit. Mus. Add. 11,414) made up of quires written at various times in the 15th cent. It has a Sar. Temporale, and what may be a calendar and Sanciorale adapted for use in some church within the Lincoln diocese. A Brev. (c. 1380) now at Stonyhurst, which, except for its containing the office for the Translation of St. Hugh, is of Sar. use, was formerly in use at Ashridge, Bucks, within the old diocese of Lincoln; and in 1390 the rector of Mareham le Fen, near Revesby, bequeathed to his clerk a "Missal of the new use of Sar. in case he wishes to be a priest." In 1391 Boniface IX gave an indult to the Augustinian abbot and convent of Notley in Lincoln diocese to follow Sar. use as other Augustinian convents did. At Lammass, 1536, Bp. White gave notice to his chapter to conform to Salisbury Cathedral use by Easter, 1557. Lincoln Cathedral enjoyed its own liberties before 1212, and had its own Ordinale before 1230. In 1265 the traditional customs of divine service and other local precedents were reduced to writing. About 1192, when the choir was consecrated, St. Hugh gave an order as to the entire Psalter and the Lit. being shared among the Canons and the Bishop in a daily recitation. The two weekly commemorations at Lincoln Minster were those of St. Hugh and the BV. Mary.

At Lichfield the Sar. Ordinale was prescribed for psalmody on double feasts in the episcopate of W. Heyworth (1420-47).

15. Use at Lichfield and Norwich. As regards the Eastern counties, we find that the Sar. Brev. was in use in Norwich about 1325. We trace it also in the College of Stoke by Clare in Suffolk, and in the Mass-book among the Franciscan nuns of St. Clare at Brusyard in 1354 (Lincoln, and other Cathedral Statutes, ed. Camb., 1897, 3 840, 844).

In the case of the Church in Wales, we learn from the Pref. to the PB of 1549 that there were some in the country who followed "the use of 16. Bangor Use. Bangor." There is no evidence that any service-book of that use was printed. Maskell included in his Anc. Liturgy, in 1844, 1846 and 1882, on the assumption that it was of Bangor, the Ordinary and Canon from a Mass-book written about 1400 and (at least in 1554) in use in Oswestry Church, Salop, in the diocese of St. Asaph, but in the 12th cent. in Lichfield. We find, however, that in Maskell's MS. the rubric of the Mass is often more nearly in verbal accord with the Sar. Consuetudinary than what we may call the vulgar rubric of the Sar. Missal itself. There is indication of the services of St. Asaph chapter being brought into some conformity with other cathedrals in 1297. In S. Wales, St. David's cathedral in 1223, and St. Mary's College there in 1372, were evidently more or less under Sar. influence. Considering that the hagiology of Wales (indicated by the dedications of churches) differed so widely from that of England, it could hardly be otherwise than that Bangor in the N.W. should find the Salisbury Sanctorale unsatisfactory, and we may well believe that part of the Principality clung with Celtic tenacity to their distinctive use. But we must reluctantly confess that we have hitherto found no trace of this use; though we cannot believe that Cranmer had in view nothing more distinctive than the Pontifical of Bp. Anian. Bangor Cathedral itself lay desolate for nearly a complete cent. after the fury of Owen Glendower in 1402, and went through troublous times, later as well as earlier, so that we can hardly be surprised if all traces of Bangor use have disappeared. It was mentioned by Cranmer as if distinct from that of Hereford and those of York, Sarum and Lincoln.

Although the Hereford Missal was printed at least once, in 1502, and some copies of the edition on vellum, and the Hereford Brev. followed, under the patronage of Lady Margaret Beaufort, in 1505, the whole edition of each came perilously near extermination. The Missal has, however, happily been reprinted under the late Dr. Henderson's editorship (1874), and two volumes of the Brev. have been produced for the HBS by W. H. Frere and L. E. G. Brown (1903, 1910), in each case with some reference to MS. sources, and also, reaching as far back as 1290, in the case of the Antiphoner, or "noted" Breviary. There are extant, of Hereford use, two 14th cent. Missals (Univ. Coll. Oxon. and Rev. E. S. Dewick), a Graduale (B. Mus. Harl. 3965), and Ordinale (Harl. 2983). Dr. Henderson, writing to a correspondent from Carlisle in 1892, mentioned that he had found in the hands of a Hereford family, after he had issued his reprint, a MS. Missal showing what this use had been at an earlier time. In the case of the Brev. likewise, the book of 1505 shows the usus modernus, while the MS. noted Brev. belonging to the Dean and Chapter was written before J. Trillek, Bp. of Hereford 1344-61, made additions and alterations. For the Missal "the secular use of Hereford cannot well be definitely placed" in either the "Sarum" or the "Gregorian" group (Legg, Westm. Missal 3 1418). On the whole it appears to have approached more nearly to the Gregorian rite, though in some details it shows Sar. peculiarities, and there was some slight tendency in its later recension to approximate more closely to Sarum. As an instance of local colour we note the mention of the altar of St. Denys in the Maundy Thursday rubric of the Hereford Missal (p. 90). It also retains in its rubric for Good Friday (p. 91) the direction for the stealthy removal of two linen cloths in modum furantis. Though this ceremonial act is noted elsewhere, as at Rheims, the peculiar phrase "in modum furantis" is evidently a survival from "Alcuin," or the Ordo Romanus which supplied long rubrics to Leofric's Sacramentary (p. 261 b). In 1413 Pope John XXIII gave an indult to Ric. Kington, who had been archdeacon of Hereford till recently, to continue to follow that use for the remainder of his life, and excused him from the obligation to conform to any other, notwithstanding that he was dean of Windsor in the diocese of Salisbury. The three weekly commemorations of Hereford use were of St. Cuthbert, St. Thomas, and the BVM.

That St. Paul's, London, should hold aloof from the influence of Salisbury is not surprising. It was perhaps partly due to the fact that the Metropolitan himself had a monastic chapter at Canterbury, and that he

adapted in all points to be a copy for other secular cathedrals and with a Psalter and Brev. which might in due natural course serve as a model for parochial clergy, that no provincial or even diocesan use of Canterbury was formed before the middle of the 16th century. One instance (1121) is on record when the forwardness of a bishop of Old Sarum among his comprovincials on an occasion of national interest called for a rebuff from the Primate (William of Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. 1 132). Bp. Roger was required to disrobe, and to make way for his brother of Winton to bless the royal marriage. On the other hand, just 100 years later, while the new cathedral church in Salisbury itself was in an early stage of building, Ric. Poore had to defend his prerogative of precedence in the college of bishops against the apparent encroachment on the dignity of his see on the part of a bishop of Rochester, Benedict, who had been precentor of St. Paul's as well as Head Justice for the home counties.

There can be no question that the labours of St. Osmund and of Ric. Poore himself supplied a felt want in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales; but yet, if Londoners even more than Yorkshiremen or those of Lincoln and Hereford were somewhat jealous for the maintenance of their local and particular customs in religious service, it was only natural and just. The Londoners' bishop ranks next to the Primate of all England within his own southern province and officiates as Dean of the college of comprovincial bishops suffragan to Canterbury. Documents now made accessible in three of the vols. of the Camden Soc., especially the records of Visitations of Churches belonging to St. Paul's Cathedral in 1249-52 and 1297, prove abundantly the existence of service-books such as Antiphoners, Ordinalia, Brevs. and Missals de usu London ecclesie in the latter half of the 13th century. Notice was at the same time taken by the visitor of a few altar books which were found to be "of monastic use," "of no use," or "not of the use of London Church," and one Brev. "which in part has no music neither the ordo of London nor of Salisbury." Apart, however, from Cathedral Statutes, Dr. W. Sparrow Simpson's unwearied investigations produce no written remains of the use of London prior to 1414, with one interesting exception, and that has been preserved only in an 18th cent. transcript by W. Cole. This consists of offices (canonical hours and Mass) for two (weekly) commemorations, viz. of St. Erkenwald and SS. Peter and Paul, which, doubtless with the usual plenum servitium of the B. Virgin, were intended to supply the three commemorations for the cathedral and other churches of the diocese of London. To these, which according to Cole were before him in a MS. written in the latter half of the 15th cent., T. Bateman, or Batemanson, a chantry priest of the time of Philip and Mary, had added in the 16th cent. a set of six benedictiones ad lectionem, and a collection of 18 Colls. in honour of saints, not one of which occurs in the Roman Missal Calendar of 1474. The names of SS. Ethelbert (Feb. 24), Mellitus (Apr. 24), Helena (Aug. 18), Ethelburga (Oct. 11), are noticeable as distinctive of London. In 1344 Clement VI authorised the Master and chaplains of St. Laurence Poulteney to use their books of Salisbury use, although their diocese was London. In 1376 Gregory XI directed the Abp. of Canterbury to examine and decide upon the petition of the parishioners of St. Giles Cripplegate to replace old office books of St. Paul's use with books of Sar., which were then used almost everywhere in the province, notwithstanding the dean's zeal for London use. In 1397 Boniface IX authorised the convent of Austin canons of St. Antony, London, to celebrate divine service according to Sar. use until they had obtained books of their own order. In the next year he gave an indult to Ric. Ludelow, a Cluniac monk and papal chaplain, to continue his practice of saying canonical hours after Sar. use, provided that he conformed to the custom of St. Saviour's, Bermondsey, when present in that monastery. In 1390 the curious old custom of Barking monastery, Essex (founded by St. Erkenwald), was confirmed, by which they had a threefold use: the hours of St. Benet, the Roman Psalterium, and St. Paul's Missal. In 1414 Bp. Clifford, with consent of the chapter, decreed that from 1st Dec. the divine offices should be celebrated at St. Paul's in conformity with the use of Sarum. Accordingly, as Dr. Sparrow Simpson tells us, the early 15th cent. London Missal (B. Mus. Harl. 2787), writtten for Malden, has purely Sar. rubrics. The canons of St. Paul's, however, still observed local customs and ceremonies in the time of Clement Maydestone. Earlier and later London MSS. are mentioned in Dr. Legg's list (Westm. Missal, iii, pp. vii, xii, xiv).—B2.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

VEIL (EUCHARISTIC).—Four Euch. Vs. are in use. There is first the large V. of coloured silk used for covering the vessels when placed on the altar, and remaining over them until the alms have been presented (vide Rubric before the Pr. for the Church Militant). Then two small linen Vs. embroidered with a cross or crosses, for covering the paten and chalice containing bread and wine. And finally a large and very thin transparent cambric V. also finely embroidered, for covering both chalice and paten containing the remains of the consecrated Elements until the time of ablution. There is no definite authority in the PB except for the last of these, but the custom comes from Pre-Reformation times and is in every sense a decent and proper one [cp. CORPORAS; PALL (iii); and RITUAL § 105, || c. 3-7].—B3.

F. L. H. MILLARD.

VENI, CREATOR SPIRITUS.—There are two translations of this famous Latin Hymn in the Ordinal. Both of these occur in the Form of Ordering of Priests; Bp. Cosin's, with a reference to the other, in the Form of Ordaining or Consecrating of an Abp. or Bp. These are the only metrical hymns which occur in the PB. The rubric which precedes them orders that the Bp. is to begin to sing or say the Hymn, the Priests, and others that are present, answering by verses. The first of the two translations, "Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire," is the work of Bp. John Cosin and occurs in his Collection of Private Devotions (1627). It was inserted in the PB of 1662 as an alternative to the older version. This latter, "Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God," seems to have been based upon a translation in Abp. Parker's Psalter, which in its turn was simply a more even rendering of an anonymous translation dating from the Ordinal of 1550 and printed in the PB of 1552; it received a third revision for the PB of 1662. The Latin words date from the 9th cent., but their author is not known. They are certainly not the work of Charlemagne, or of St. Ambrose, or of Gregory the Great, to each of whom they have been ascribed. Present criticism is inclined to favour the authorship of Rabanus Maurus, Abp. of Mainz (776-856). Veni Creator took the place of the Terce Hymn in many Brevs., and was in the 11th cent. adopted for use in the Ordination Services. Its original text is as follows:

1. Veni Creator Spiritus,
Mentes tuorum visita,
Imple superna gratia
Quae tu creasti pectora:
2. Qui Paraclitus diceris,
Donum Dei altissimi,
Fons vivus, ignis, caritas,
Et spiritalis unctio.
3. Tu septiformis munere,
Dextrae Dei tu digitus,
Tu rite promisso Patris
Sermone ditas guttura.
4. Accende lumen sensibus,
Infunde amorem cordibus,
Infirma nostri corporis
Virtute firmans perpeti.
5. Hostem repellas longius,
Pacemque dones protinus;
Ductore sic te praevio
Vitemus omne noxium.
6. Per te sciamus, da, Patrem,
Noscamus atque Filium,
Te utriusque Spiritum
Credamus omni tempore.

(For further information, see Julian's Dict. of Hymnology, s.v.)—Q2. MAURICE F. BELL.

VENIAL SIN.—The expression V. Sin does not occur in the PB, but is implied in the phrase "deadly sin" (Lit.). V. sins are the daily failings of good Christians, which, though needing forgiveness, are not—by God's mercy—grave and wilful enough to remove the soul from grace. The distinction is a real one, but needs to be carefully used; as habitual venial sin may easily become deadly.—rd.] A. R. WHITHAM.

VENITE.—The first word, in Latin, of Ps 95 which has been, from the time of St. Benedict (515), if not earlier, sung as an introduction to the psalmody at Mattins. It received the name of the Invitatory Ps., and hence the antiphon used with it came to be called the INVITATORY. In the PB the V. is replaced by another Cant. on Easter Day (ANTHEM), and the rubric directs that on the 19th day of the month "it is not to be read here, but in the ordinary course of the Pss." As this in reality makes no difference—the 95th being the first Ps. for that morning—it seems probable that the rubric, when written, contemplated the singing of a metrical hymn between V. and the other Pss., as had been done at Mattins in the Latin service.—D2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

VERGER (Lat. virgarius).—An official, so called from his duty to carry a verge or wand (Lat. virga), which may be of wood, or a silver mace. At Lincoln we find that from the 14th to the 16th cents. there were six virgarii. Four of these, called bedelli Episcopi, were paid by the Bishop. On certain festivals they preceded the celebrant, carrying maces. They also preceded the Bp. when he came from the palace to the cathedral, and attended upon him during service. A fifth V. was entitled "the dean's verger." It was the duty of one of these Vs. to keep the door of the chapter-house during meetings of the chapter. It is still the duty of the Vs. of a cathedral to head a procession before, during, or after, service; to conduct the preacher to and from the pulpit; and of the dean's V., to precede the dean to stall, lectern, or pulpit, if he preaches or takes any part in the service. Another of the Vs. is often known as "the canons' verger." The Vs. are in charge of the cathedral, whenever it is open, out of service time, and regulate the visits of strangers to the choir, chapter-house, etc., and find seats for them during service. In cathedrals and parish churches, Vs. have usually worn a stuff gown, ornamented with velvet. At the enthronement of Dr. King (1885) as Bp. of Lincoln, the procession was headed by a V., styled "The Bedell." In foreign cathedrals and important churches, a procession is commonly headed by a beadle, or "Suisse," wearing a three-cornered hat and quasi-military uniform, carrying a halberd, or a silver-headed black staff. In English churches, where the V. is often also Sexton, he heads a procession, and conducts the preacher to the pulpit, and may, as the churchwardens' deputy, see to the seating of the congregation. Sometimes there is only one church officer, who is both parish-clerk and Verger. He may be assisted by a mere gravedigger. Formerly he might also be the beadle of the parish, and wear his uniform in church. —A3. J. E. SWALLOW.

VERSE.—The word Vs., in the Pref. "Concerning the Service, etc.," means the Vs. or texts which formed part of every RESPOND. Each such V. was sung by the chanters and not by the whole choir. Hence has come the custom of giving an anthem, or part of an anthem, sung by solo voices the title of "V." It was no doubt the fact that aft. each Vers the latter clause of the respond was repeated, and sometimes the whole respond as well, by way of conclusion, that suggests the mention of "vain repetitions" in this same sentence of the Preface. —B2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

VERSICLE.—A very short pr., said by the officiant, to which the congregation reply with a similar prayer, called the 1. Introductory. Responses in the Divine Service is exceedingly ancient, certainly anterior to the 6th cent.; and, as the Psalter was the great storehouse of devotion in the early Church, we naturally find all the most ancient Vv. and Rr. drawn from it. In the PB, Vv. and Rr. are employed in two ways: (1) as introductory to the psalmody at MP and EP; (2) as leading up to a Coll. When used for the latter purpose, they are technically known as Proces.

The first V. and R., "O Lord, open Thou," etc. (Ps. 51 15), were in use, from at all events the 6th cent., before Mattins only. They were first prefixed also to Evensong in 1552.

2. At MP and EP. N.B.—In 1549 these and the other Vv. and Rr. were in the singular number, as in the Psalter itself. The next V. and R., "O God, make speed," etc., consist of the first words of Ps. 70, which was in early times said all through at this point of the service; and the Gloria Patri which follows is really that said at the end of the Ps. After this, Alleluia was said, except from Septuagesima to Easter, when its place was taken by the couplet, "Laus Tibi, Domine: Rex aeternae gloriae" (Praise be to Thee. O Lord King of everlasting glory). In 1549 the translation, "Praise ye the Lord," was substituted for the Alleluia, which however was to be added "from Easter to Trinity Sunday." This addition was struck out in 1552, and the R., "The Lord's Name be praised," was first inserted in the Scottish PB (1637) and adopted by the revisers of 1662. Proces leading up to a Coll. are found in the PB not only at MP and EP, but in the following services: Lit., Confirm., Marriage, VS, Churching, Communion and the Accession Service. The general form of such Proces is: the Lesser Lit., the Lord's Pr., Versicles and Responses, and the Coll. The regular place for "The Lord be with you," etc., and "Let us pray," is immediately bef. the Coll. It is difficult to conjecture what led the revisers of 1552 to put these in a new and unheard of position bef. the Lesser Lit., but possibly the transition from the Cr. to the Lesser Lit. was felt to be otherwise too abrupt. In the Lit., Confirm. and Communion we find "Let us pray" in its right position bef. the Coll. In the ancient Proces the Apostles' Creed was said aft. the Lord's Pr.: its position bef. the Proces is a novelty introduced in 1552. In 1549 it had been placed between the Lesser Lit. and the Lord's Pr. Prime and Compline were the only ancient offices at which this Creed was said in the Proces. The Vv. and Rr. aft. the Lord's Pr. are a selection from those in the Sarum rite. "O Lord, shew," etc. (Ps. 85 7); "O Lord, save the King," etc. (Ps. 20 9; in the Vulgate, "Domine, saluum fac regem," etc.); "Endue," etc. (Ps. 132 9); "O Lord, save Thy people," etc. (Ps. 28 10). The next, "Give peace," etc., was not a V. and R., but the antiphon in the Memorial for Peace (COMMEMORATION), said aft. Lauds and Evensong: "Da pacem, Domine, in diebus nostris: quia non est alius qui pugnet pro nobis, nisi Tu, Deus noster." The last, "O God, make clean," etc. (Ps. 51 10, 11), occurs in the Proces at Prime.

Aft. the Lord's Pr. in the LITANY only one V. and R., "O Lord, deal not," etc. (Ps. 103 10), is retained out of the large number which were here used. The omission of the Amen aft. the Coll. must be pure accident. That which follows: "O Lord, arise," etc., has no connection with the Coll., but is the antiphon used with the first words of Ps. 44, "O God, we have heard," etc., and the Gloria Patri, as an introduction to the Lit. on solemn occasions. Its presence here is to be explained by the fact that the suffrages that follow, "From our enemies," etc., are not Vv. and Rr. but a Lit. anciently used in England in time of war: "Ab inimicis nostris defende nos, Christe. Afflictionem nostram benignus vide. Dolorem cordis nostri respice clemens. Peccata populi Tui pius indulge. Orationes nostras pius exaudi. Fili Dei vivi, miserere nobis. Hic et in perpetuum nos custodire digneris, Christe: exaudi nos, Christe: exaudi, exaudi nos, Christe (Sarum Processional). They are followed by the V. and R., "O Lord, let Thy mercy," etc. (Ps. 33 2), leading up to "Let us pray" and a Collect.

In the CONFIRMATION service there are these Vv. and Rr.: "Our help is in," etc. (Ps. 124 7); "Blessed be the Name," etc. (Ps. 113 2); "Lord, hear," etc. (Ps. 102 1). This last was inserted in 1552, taking the place of "The Lord be with you," etc., which was in accordance with the ancient office. In the MARRIAGE SERVICE we find the following Versicles and Responses: "O Lord, save Thy servant," etc. (Ps. 86 2); "O Lord, send them help," etc. (Ps. 20 2, but the R. is altered); "Be unto them," etc. (Ps. 81 3); and "O Lord, hear," etc., as above. In the VS (SICK, VISITATION OF) the Vv. and Rr. are the same as in the Marriage Service, mutatis mutandis, with the exception of the third—"Let the enemy," etc. (Ps. 89 23, the translation being from the Vulgate, "Nihil proficiat inimicus in eo," etc.). In the CHURCHING OF WOMEN we have again the same Vv. and Rr. as in the case of the Marriage Service, with the omission of the second, "O Lord, send them help," etc. In all the above occasional offices the Vv. and Rr. have been retained from the ancient use of Sarum. The Vv. and Rr. in the COMMUNION are those of the ancient Ash-Wed. service. The two first are in substance the same as in the Marriage Service; the third is, "Help us, O God," etc. (Ps. 79 9, the translation following the Vulgate version). Then follows "O Lord, hear," etc., as before. In the Accession Service (ROYAL ACCESSION) the Vv. and Rr. unite those at MP and EP with those used in the above occasional offices.—82.

VERSIONS OF THE PB (MODERN).—The PB has already been translated into a large number of languages, in all parts of the world. We append to this art. as complete as possible a list of these up to date, but their number is constantly being augmented. Wherever a Ch. of Eng. Mission is established, the PB is translated (in whole or in part) into the vernacular, as soon as a congregation of converts has been formed. The most necessary services are translated first, the Pss., Epistles and Gospels being taken from the best vernacular version of the Bible. Tentative versions of the PB are carefully revised by the best scholars before the final version is completed. This may be locally published, but the course generally adopted is to submit it to the local diocesan committee and the bp. (if there be one) for approval, and to request the SPCK. to publish it. Except for the generosity of this society, many a version could not be printed, for lack of funds. In accordance with the rules of the SPCK., the sanction of the Abp. of Canterbury is necessary before any version or revision, at all "intentionally altered, whether in text or rubrics, from the original," can be accepted for publication by the society. When there is any difficulty in finding a suitable word in the vernacular to translate any technical term (such as Catholic, deacon, priest, etc.) in the PB, transliteration may be used. But the present Abp. of Canterbury in that case requires the transliteration to be that of the equivalent (if any) word used in the Greek of the NT. Unfortunately, this rule has not been always strictly adhered to in the past. Hence in some versions certain distinctly sacerdotal terms have been introduced:—e.g., some twenty-one years ago a bp. refused to permit the PB word "priest" to be rendered (as in the previous version in the same vernacular) by the word used to translate ἱερεῖς in the NT in that tongue, but insisted on the adoption of the English word "priest" in transliteration, which was the more objectionable because the Cowley Fathers had already introduced that word with the meaning of lepebs. Fortunately, in versions intended for use in Mahometan lands there is less danger of this: for the word Qasīs, or some modified form of it (e.g., in Persian Kashish, in Kiswahili Kasīsī), is used for ἱερεῖς. Qasīs is the Arabic form of the Syriac Qashishā, used in the Peshittā to render the latter Greek word.

1. Method of Procedure with Regard to New Versions.

In versions for use in countries outside the British Empire, the State Prs. are omitted, and others inserted in their stead in favour of the sovereigns and governments of the respective countries. In no country in Europe has any native Ch. adopted our Liturgy, nor is there any reason to expect them to do so. The PB is very useful in the Mission field, but it is not in all respects suited to the circumstances of the native Chs. there. It requires, in the nature of the case, large alterations to adapt it to the varying needs of each country, but no authority exists to sanction this. In almost every case the necessity of making a literal translation from the English has rendered the style of the vernacular versions stilted and somewhat unidiomatic. As has well been said: "A translation may be etymologically perfect, and yet no more give the force of the original than the awkward dancing of a bear represents the graceful pirouettes of the ballet." When the Chs. in the Mission field become independent, they will doubtless draw up each a liturgy of its own.

We proceed to deal very briefly with certain important versions, taking as specimens of the rest one Romance (French), one Teutonic (German), one Semitic (Hebrew), and two Asiatic Aryan (Persian and Ararat-Armenian) Versions.

(a) French. The present French version is in large measure modern. There are two distinct editions, differing especially in the State Prs. The edition intended for and in use in the Channel Islands agrees with the English PB throughout, except in having a double set of Pss., one for reading and the other for singing. In the other edition the requisite alteration in the State Prs. is made (see also VERSIONS OF PB, OLDER, § 7).

(b) German. The SPCK. German version of the PB is some sixty years old. Germans find much tautology—or what to them seems such—in it, as, e.g., the German rendering of "to acknowledge and confess," "sins and wickednesses," "pardoneth and absolveth," etc. This somewhat detracts from their approval of the book.

(c) Hebrew. The PB has been translated into simple and excellent Hebrew. Yet, as it is mainly intended for the use of Hebrew Christians, it would have been much more useful and would have had much greater charm for them had the translators adopted as much as possible the phraseology employed in the very ancient Synagogue Service-Book, familiar to them all since infancy. Instead of this the word priest (i.e., ἱερεῖς) is rendered by ḥōhēn (i.e., lepebs), a title which to this day none among the Hebrews except Aaron's descendants dare assume. This seems likely to repel Hebrews from Christianity. In default of a better word, why should not ḥōhēn (i.e., lepebs), the word used in the Hebrew NT, in both the Salkinson-Ginsburg and Delitzsch's versions, to render ἡγεμονία be employed? "Minister" is generally rendered by שֶׁלִּיחַ (sheliakh-hassibbar), which has little to recommend it.

(d) Persian and Ararat-Armenian. In both these versions the translators have made a practice of referring to every passage in the Persian and Ararat-Armenian translations of the Bible before rendering any PB phrase in which the English appeared to have been affected or coloured by the language of Holy Scripture. They thus endeavoured to produce in their respective versions the same effect of fidelity to Scripture and of being pervaded by its spirit, which is so noteworthy in the PB. This is a fair instance of the care taken to produce a perfect version of the PB. It may be said that what the Germans call the tautology of the PB gives it an added charm to Persians, being in accord with the genius of their own tongue. It is not so with Armenian, however.

The following list shows into what European, Asiatic, African, American, and Oceanic languages the PB has, in whole or in part, been translated. Other versions are constantly being added. Versions in italics are as yet only partial, not containing the whole of the PB.

VERSIONS OF THE PB (OLDER).—A considerable number of partial or complete versions of the PB into Latin have been made at different times and at different stages in the evolution of the book itself. Originally, two main objects were aimed at, to which a third was sometimes added: (1) To fix the meaning of the words used, which could be done in a classical or "dead" language better than in a living and changing tongue. In this the analogy of the statutes of Tudor and Stuart times was followed. Thus the 39 Arts. of 1571 were published authoritatively in Latin and English at the same time. (2) To enable Continental scholars, especially the Reformers, to watch the progress of the Reformation in England. (3) To be used in Ireland when the Irish clergy did not understand the English PB.

The first Latin version of the First PB (1549) of Edward VI was by Alesius (Aless), and was published in 1551. Almost at the same time another was made in Ireland by Smith. Aless' error in rendering overnight in the 2nd Rubric before the Communion of the Sick by postridie instead of pridie passed thence into several later versions. Aless' version was hastily and not very honestly prepared. Colls. altered from the Missal in the PB were often by him reproduced in their original form. Some renderings are loose, and some parts reproduce unaltered phrases in the Order of Communion of 1548 which had been changed in 1549.

2. Latin Versions of PB of 1549.

The greater part of the Elizabethan PB of 1559 including the Occasional Offices, edited probably by Haddon, appeared in Latin in 1560, by the Queen's authority. It followed Aless far too largely, even in his errors. Whitaker's Latin PB of 1569 (MEP, Lit., Cat., Colls.) was but slightly altered from this. The whole PB in Latin, published by Wulf, first appeared in 1571, and another edition in 1574. Versions of the Cat. separately by Aless and Whitaker and another by Vantrollier are mentioned. Mockett's unauthorised version of the PB appeared in 1617, but was proscribed and burnt.

3. Latin Versions of PB of 1569.

The Act of Uniformity of 1662 rendered Latin and Welsh versions necessary (as it practically did one in French). The Act permitted a Latin service at both Oxford and Cambridge Universities, at Westminster, Winchester, and Eton Colleges, and at Convocations. Therefore in April, 1662, Convocation committed the task of translating the Revised Liturgy of 1662 into Latin to John Earle (afterwards Bp. of Salisbury) and Prof. John Peirson. The latter soon retired, and his place was filled by John Dolben (afterwards Abp. of York). Their work, revised and completed by Dean John Durel, was published in 1670. Made by authority of Convocation, according to Act of Uniformity, it was dedicated to the King (cp. Authorised Version of Bible), printed by the King's printer and sold by the King's bookseller. It is still the only authorised Latin Version of the PB. Durel took the Pss., Canticles, Epistles and Gospels from the Old Sarum Use, which had borrowed them (except the Canticles) from the Vulgate. He also consulted the Elizabethan versions of the PB, which have had their effect on his choice of language in many places.

4. Durel's Latin Version of PB of 1662.

Parsell's Latin Version of 1713 is in the main based on Durel's, but it takes the Pss., Epistles and Gospels from Castellio's revision of the Bible. Among less important translations may be mentioned that published by Bowyer in 1720, and another by Harwood in 1785. Bagster, in 1821, published Carey's revision of Bowyer's edition. Carey largely followed Durel and Harwood, though in some cases affected by Parsell's renderings. Other editions of Bagster's appeared in 1834 and 1866, and one revised by Canon Warren is now promised. Parker's excellent edition of 1848 was based on the Elizabethan versions and that of Durel. Bright and Medd's version (2nd ed., 1869) was intended to introduce sacerdotal language. It has, of course, no authority. In some passages taken from the Missals, Aless permitted the word sacerdos to remain, though elsewhere he generally avoids by Bowyer in 1720, and another by Harwood in 1785. Bagster, in 1821, published Carey's revision of Bowyer's edition. Carey largely followed Durel and Harwood, though in some cases affected by Parsell's renderings. Other editions of Bagster's appeared in 1834 and 1866, and one revised by Canon Warren is now promised. Parker's excellent edition of 1848 was based on the Elizabethan versions and that of Durel. Bright and Medd's version (2nd ed., 1869) was intended to introduce sacerdotal language. It has, of course, no authority. In some passages taken from the Missals, Aless permitted the word sacerdos to remain, though elsewhere he generally avoids using the word. Durel never once uses sacerdos, but always the proper NT word presbyter. This agrees with Hooker and Jewel. Bright and Medd constantly and deliberately employ sacerdos for priest in the PB.

The first Ancient Greek Version of the PB was that made by Whitaker, Master of St. John's Coll., Cambridge, and published with his Latin rendering in 1569 (see § 3). It contained MEP, Lit., Cat., and Colls. The whole PB in Greek, by Petley, printed in 1638, was dedicated to Abp. Laud. Duport, Greek professor at Cambridge, published in 1665 his much better known version, dedicated to Abp. Sheldon. Of course, this was a translation of the PB of 1662. Duport largely followed Petley. Bagster in 1821 published an edition of this Greek Version, interpagated with a Latin rendering (see § 5), adding the Epistles and Gospels from the Greek NT. In this revision the word minister is sometimes rendered κρηδιστής, sometimes λειτουργός; but, contrary to NT usage, priest is generally represented by ιερεύς.

The First PB of Edward VI was translated, about 1550, into French, by order of Sir Hugh Paulet, Governor of Calais, for use there and in the Channel Islands. This version was amended, so as to agree with Edward VI's Second PB, by the Lord Chancellor's and the Bp. of Ely's orders, in 1552. A version made in 1616 was very hastily altered for use at the French service held in the Savoy (Strand) Chapel on Sunday, 14th July, 1661. The Revised Eng. PB of 1662 rendered a new French version necessary. This was hastily prepared by Dean John Durel (see § 4), who in consequence made too much use of the version of 1616. His French rendering was published before his Latin, being required for use in Jersey and Guernsey and also in the Savoy Chapel. It was sanctioned by Royal ordinance (6th Oct., 1662), and the use of all other versions forbidden. (See also WELSH VERSION OF THE PB.)—B1.

VESPERS.—The evening office of pr., commonly called Even-song in England. Its form has been borrowed from that of Lauds. It is composed of five Pss., varying for each day of the week, with Antiphons, a short chapter (in old times followed by a Respond), a hymn, the cant. Magnificat, and the Coll. The Pss. are those of the latter part of the Psalter beginning with Ps. 110, and omitting those already allotted to Lauds, etc. (See HOURS OF PRAYER.)—B2.

VESTRY.—A V. is a room which adjoins the church or is a part of it and screened off from it, where the clergy vest and where the vestures, registers, and many other articles are kept.

In old cathedral and abbey churches the space behind the screen at the back of the altar was used as a V., access to which was obtained through the doors on either side of the altar. This arrangement can be seen in Westminster Abbey, St. Albans Cathedral, Winchester Cathedral, the chapel of Magdalen College, Oxford, and in many other places.

There are examples in other churches of low screens with one door behind the altar. Sometimes the altar stood out 7 or 8 feet in front of the east wall, thus affording a V. space.

In many small churches there were no vestries, and in consequence vesting was done at the altar. The vestments and vessels were kept in chests and aumbries in different parts of the church, and probably each altar had its own chest and aumbry near at hand.

In the case of old churches the greatest care should be exercised in the provision of vestries. The most deplorable acts of vandalism have been perpetrated in converting side-chapels into vestries and organ-chambers.

When a new church is built, a V. or vestries are always provided. There should be a priest's V. and a choir V., and some advocate the luxury of a churchwardens' Vestry.

Vestries are not famed for being clean, tidy, and orderly, as they certainly ought to be. Everything should be kept in its proper place. Cupboards and chests should be provided (a chest of drawers will be found very useful), and many other things should find their place in a V., e.g., a table, chairs, ink-pot, useful pens, blotting-paper, note-paper, a hanging calendar, a clock, a looking-glass, etc., all clean and in order.—R6.

H. D. MACNAMARA.

VESTRY MEETING.—The V. is the council of the parish for eccles. purposes. It is so called because its meetings are usually held in the VESTRY. Vs. may be classed as: (A) Ordinary, and (B) Extraordinary.

(A). The ordinary V. consists of the minister of the parish and all persons of either sex who pay rates or occupy premises that are rated for the relief of the poor in respect of the parish: where, however, a person has made default for three months in the payment of a poor rate his right to attend and vote at a VM. is suspended till the rate is paid. A VM. should be convened by the minister of the parish or the churchwardens: a private parishioner cannot convene it. A written or printed notice, duly signed, should be given, specifying the place, day, and hour of the meeting, and the purposes for which it is convened; and such notice should be posted bef. divine service on a Sunday three clear days at least bef. the day on which the meeting is to be held, on or near to the principal doors of all the public chs. and chapels of the Ch. of Eng. in the parish in which divine service is held. The meeting need not be held in the V. or indeed in any part of the church; it always may, and sometimes must, be held in a place at a distance from it. The minister of the parish is the chairman of the meeting ex officio; if he is absent, the V. may elect a chairman from among its members present. The voting is usually by show of hands; but no resolution can be carried except by an absolute majority of those present at the meeting. However, if a poll be demanded by any member whether bef. or aft. a show of hands, a poll must be taken, and, if necessary, an adjournment may be made for the purpose. Where there is a show of hands, each member has one vote; but, where there is a poll, a member has from one to six votes according to rating. The chairman may vote as a member, and he has also a casting vote. Minutes of the proceedings of the V. must be kept in a book; such minutes must be signed by the chairman; they need not be confirmed.

The V. normally exercises the following functions. (a) It appoints two CHURCHWARDENS annually, with the concurrence of the minister of the parish. If there is a disagreement between the minister and the parishioners in regard to the appointments, the minister appoints one and the parishioners the other of the churchwardens. In many parishes this has become the customary procedure. (b) It may also appoint SIDESMEN with the concurrence of the minister. (c) It usually receives the accounts of the churchwardens at the end of their year of office. (d) It controls the custody of the V. books and accounts. (e) It may make a CHURCH RATE, though the payment of such a rate cannot be enforced. (f) It should be consulted where it is proposed to make alterations in the fabric or the furniture of the ch., or in the churchyard.

(B) Extraordinary Vs. include the following. (1) Quasi-Vestries. In the new parochial areas, formed under the Ch. Building and other Acts of the last cent., meetings are held in the nature of VMs. There is, however, no plural voting on a poll, as these meetings are not the meetings of a V. properly so-called. (2) Select Vestries. In some parishes the ordinary V. has been superseded by a V. consisting of a limited number of the parishioners who are constituted members of the V. in some special manner. Some of these select Vs. are the creatures of custom, others of statute.—A2.

2. Extra-ordinary Vestries.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

VIA MEDIA.—See CHRISTIAN RELIGION, § 21.

VIATICUM.—This Lat. word (= provision for travelling) is sometimes applied to the Euch. given to the dying as food for their long journey (see 1 Kings 19 8). In this sense it first occurs (in its Gr. form εὐχιστήριον) in the 13th canon of the 1st Council of Nice, 325.—N7.

J. W. TYRER.

VICAR.—The term V. means a substitute, one who takes the place of another, or fulfils the duty which he cannot discharge himself. Ecclesiastically, the title of V. is given to the priest of a parish where the rectory has been appropriated. He takes the place of the rector as regards all spiritual jurisdiction, functions, and duties, but his relation to the temporalities is different (see BENEFICE and INCUMBENT). He does not take the place of the rector in the sense of being his deputy or as deriving authority from him; strictly speaking there is no rector. The patron may be said to have been excused from presenting a person to be rector, and instead thereof presents a person in place of a rector, that is a vicarius, or V. The V., just as much as the rector, has his spiritual jurisdiction directly from the Bp. by institution, and is put by induction as fully into possession of the ch. and churchyard as a rector is, but he has no right to all the temporalities. The use of the term V. is thus somewhat misleading, inasmuch as the title RECTOR is given to a parish priest, not in respect to the temporalities, but in respect to his spiritual government. That spiritual government is given to a V. as fully and completely by institution as it is to a rector. The forms of institution and induction are precisely the same in the case of a V. as in the case of a rector. It is one of the unfortunate results of the grave mediæval crime of the appropriation of rectories to the monastic bodies, that the misleading term V. came into use, as it conveys an impression that the spiritual or canonical status of the parish priest so designated is different from, or even inferior to, that of the parish priest who is designated rector, whereas such status is identical. The true remedy would be to abandon the use of the titles V. and perpetual curate, and call all parish priests rectors, whatever be the nature of their temporalities. In some of the Colonies the curious custom has arisen of calling the parish priest V., in countries where there are no tithes and no lay rectors or impropriators, and, therefore, where the use of the title V. is an anomaly.¹ In France at the present time vicaire is used in a different sense from the English use of V. It means there the assistant of the parish priest who himself is called the curé, or curate. It there means deputy, one having only delegated jurisdiction, whereas our vicars are not properly deputies and have ordinary jurisdiction.—ra.

E. G. WOOD.

VICAR-GENERAL.—On occasions when a bishop was absent from his diocese (e.g., on embassies) he was accustomed to delegate his functions to a vicarius generalis. Later, this officer had charge only in matters of voluntary jurisdiction, as in visitation, institution, licensing, and the sequestration of vacant benefices, being appointed for life by any bishop who thought fit to have such an officer. Now, it is usual to commit the office of VG. to the CHANCELLOR of the diocese along with that of OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL. The only diocese in which the office now survives separately is that of Sodor and Man. Each archbishop has a VG., who holds a court for the confirmation of bishops. In recent times this court has been the scene of considerable disturbance (e.g., Rex v. Abp. Cant., 1902, 2 KB. 503) in connection with the formal "praeconization" of opposers to appear and show cause against the validity of the election or the qualifications of the elected. The patents of the Vicars-General of Canterbury and York are printed in Rep. Eccl. Courts Comm., 1881 (1883), 666-7, 696-7.—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

VICARS-CHORAL; MINOR CANONS.—Two names applied to the same persons. Jebb (Choral Service) says: "The distinction between MC. and VC. is not very apparent; and the present usage of the Church would seem to make them identical as to the duties they have to perform. . . . The term 'MC.' is restricted to the clergy; that of 'VC.' is common to them and laymen." In some cathedral bodies both names are found still. They have always been deputies for the canons and prebendaries for choral purposes, but in some foundations—notably at St. Paul's—the MC. form a "College" under a president, and are a separate chapter. This arrangement dates from the reign of Richard II (Jebb).—A3, Q1.

JAMES BADEN POWELL.

VIGIL (vigilia, pervigilia).—A fast day immediately bef. certain festivals; see EVEN.—In PB, Christmas, Purification, Annunciation, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost have vigils; also SS. Matthias (not Sarum), John Baptist, Peter, James, Bartholomew, Matthew, Simon and Jude, Andrew and Thomas, and All Saints. But a V. never falls on a Sunday, when fasting is forbidden (see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 2); if therefore one of these festivals fall on a Monday the V. is on the Saturday.² It is not quite easy to say why some other festivals have not Vs. assigned to them; some perhaps because they fall in Eastertide or Christmastide (yet in Sarum Epiph.

had a V.); St. Luke, perhaps, because St. Etheldreda's Day precedes, a most popular English festival: the Conversion of St. Paul, perhaps, because it was always inferior to the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul on June 29. Michaelmas, on the other hand, is a feast sui generis; perhaps it has no V. because the angels have not passed through suffering.

Vigils are found in most Churches. At first, as the name and the corresponding vavvixis, pernoctatio, denote, a V. was a night spent in prayer. When St. Cyprian was apprehended, A.D. 258, a V. was being observed (Life 15). Chrysostom (Hom. de Martyr. 2 668 D) attests Vs. before martyrs' festivals. Socrates (HE 6 8) speaks of both Catholics and Arians keeping V. before each Lord's day. Silvia describes weekly Vs. To this day the E. Syrians keep up the old idea of a V. bef. Great Festivals; on these occasions the night service, always a long one, is enormously protracted, the whole Psalter being said. But with them there is no special fast on the day bef., other than the ordinary Advent and Lenten fast. And probably the present idea of a V. as a fast day only began in or after the 9th cent. In the Sarum Brev. Te D. is forbidden on Vs., except on that of Epiphany if it fall on a Sunday (ed. Procter and Wordsworth, 1 30). In the Amer. PB all Vs. are omitted except that of Easter.—C3.

A. J. MACLEAN.

VIRGIN.—Self-dedication to a single life was regarded in the primitive Church as an ascetic act honouring to God and virtuous in itself. Women who so consecrated themselves lived at home and had not necessarily special duties in the ch., though they were honoured and recognised. At first there seems to have been no particular ceremony for admitting such virgines canonicas, nor was the act irrevocable, but the veil that was worn suggested the idea of a mystical marriage, and in the Can. Hippol. (751) they are recognised by the laying on of hands after due inquiry as to age and character. From the 4th cent. a stricter view of vows prevailed, and the age at which they were allowed was raised (in Africa 25; in Spain, where they were considered irrevocable, 40). A distinction between the veiled and the unveiled V. was drawn, and the ceremony of veiling seems to have been performed on the Great Festivals. A 3rd cent. painting in the Cemetery of St. Priscilla represents the veiling of a virgin (Lowrie, Christian Art and Archaeology, p. 247).

VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST.—The VB. of Christ is asserted explicitly in the Proper Pref. and the Coll. for Christmas, as well as in the Creeds. The a posteriori evidence of the fact consists:—(a) of the narratives in Mt. and Lk., (b) of some phrases in St. Paul, St. John, St. Ignatius, and one or two other early writers.

(a) The Virgin Birth of Christ is not part of the "Synoptic tradition," which begins with His Baptism. The earliest Christian preaching was of things as to which the preachers were eye-witnesses, and the Virgin Birth was necessarily outside the range of their personal knowledge. The Nativity narratives are independent of the Synoptic tradition. That in Lk. 1, 2, clearly goes back to Jewish sources (see Sanday, Critical Questions 135); and it presents features which suggest that it depends on a woman's evidence (cp. the method of dating events in 1 24, 26, 56, the incident mentioned in 1 44, and generally the tenderness of the details). These considerations point to the conclusion that the Virgin is the ultimate authority on whose testimony the narrative rests. It is from the point of view of the Maiden Mother's experience that the story is told throughout (cp. 1 29).

In Mt. 1 the story of the Nativity is told from a quite different point of view; in Mt. the anxiety of Joseph, as in Lk. the faith of Mary, is the most conspicuous feature, and it is not unreasonable to infer that the sources of the Matthaean narrative go back to information supplied by Joseph. It is, at any rate, quite different from the Lucan story; we have here two convergent traditions, coming from distinct sources, which must be regarded therefore as mutually corroborative in regard to the main fact they describe. It should further be observed of the Matthaean account that:—(1) it unquestionably speaks of a supernatural birth, despite the eccentric variants of the Sinaitic Syriac at 1 16, 21, 25; and (2) it was not invented in the interests of prophecy, and to provide a fulfilment for OT predictions. For there is no trace that the Jews ever interpreted Isa 7 14 as meaning that the Messiah should be miraculously born of a Virgin (Dalman, Words of Jesus, ET, 276), which indeed they did not expect; "almah" does not necessarily mean more than "young woman." The evangelist's commentary on Isa. 7 14 presupposes a tradition already well established. Jewish soil being thus unfavourable to the growth of a "myth," like that of the Virgin Birth, some writers, e.g., Usener (Encycl. Bibl. 3 3352), have suggested that it must be of pagan origin, and have been at the pains to collect heathen parallels. Harnack has sufficiently answered Usener as to this (see Lobstein, Virgin Birth of Christ 128), the early date at which the Nativity stories of the Gospel appear, the horror with which primitive Christianity regarded paganism, and the intensely Jewish atmosphere of Mt. 1 and Lk. 1, 2, being conclusive against a pagan origin for the belief.

(b) There is nothing decisive in St. Paul, although Rom. 1 3 and Gal. 4 4 are apposite, nor in St. John, although there may be something in the suggestion that in Jn. 2 3-5 the Mother seems conscious of the miraculous personality of her son. But St. Ignatius (A.D. 115) is very plain on the point: "Hidden from the prince of this world were the virginity of Mary and her child-bearing and likewise the Lord's death—three mysteries to be cried aloud which were wrought in the silence of God" (Eph. 19; cp. also Smyrn. 1). This is a highly important testimony. The Virgin Birth is as certain for Ignatius as is the Crucifixion; so he tells the Church of Ephesus, which owed much both to St. Paul and to St. John. This could hardly have been a received doctrine in that city as early as 115, were it not congruous with the well-remembered teaching of these great Apostles.

This is the direct evidence. It points back to the witness of the only two persons who could assert of their own knowledge that Jesus was born of a Virgin Mother, and the fact was received for true in the Church in the opening years of the 2nd cent. Is the evidence sufficient to compel belief? Would such evidence compel belief of a similar event alleged to have happened in our own day? It is urged by some that it would not be regarded as sufficient. Here then an important consideration must be borne in mind. The measure of our credence to testimony of this sort must depend on our estimate of the Child alleged to be miraculously born. The infancy narratives would not persuade us of their literal truth, if there were nothing exceptional in the character and history of the Child. But we read these narratives in the light of the Personality of Jesus Christ, and then they assume a new significance. The a posteriori witness, good so far as it goes, receives powerful and necessary reinforcement from all that we have learned as to the Incarnation and Resurrection of Jesus.

(1) His Resurrection.—this is here assumed—does not prove the Virgin Birth, but the two are easier to believe taken together, than either would be separately. It is natural to think that the Body which defied the dissolutions and corruptions of death was not begotten of mortal seed (cp. Ac. 2 24). There is a propriety of correspondence between the manner of Christ's entrance into this earthly life, and the fact of His superiority to death.

(2) Christ was morally sinless. Science assures us, such is the damnosa hereditas of our ancestry, that a sinless man would be a physical miracle, no less than a moral one. Not that there is anything essentially sinful in the normal antecedents of human birth; but, if a sinless man was ever born, experience and science both suggest that there must have been something abnormal in the circumstances of his conception in the womb. And the allegation of the Virgin Birth supplies us with such an exceptional antecedent. This line of thought does not necessarily lead (as has been suggested) to the Roman doctrine of the Immaculate Conception; for all that is urged is that the normal conditions of birth are insufficient to account for a sinless man. Nor is it to be forgotten that the Virgin Birth presupposes not only the absence of human fatherhood, but also the operation of the Divine Spirit: "conceived by the Holy Ghost" as well as "born of the Virgin Mary." Here is the exceptional antecedent which reason demands, but we could not prove a priori that it might not have been otherwise supplied.

(3) The doctrine of the Incarnation does not prove that Christ must have been born of a

Virgin. The Incarnatus est is logically separable from the Natus ex Virgine Maria. But no instance has been produced from the past history of the Church of belief in the former without belief in the latter. There is a congruity between the two beliefs, which cannot be explained away. Nor would it be easy to accept ex animo St. Paul's teaching in 1 Cor. 15 about Christ as the Representative Man, or St. John's teaching as to His Divine Personality, did one believe that He was born of human parents, exactly as every other man has been. Talis decet partus Deum. This has been the mind of the Church ever since she began to reflect upon the matter, as may be shown from the history of the Creeds.

The subject is discussed in all works on the Creed. See also: Gore, Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation VIRTUES AND VICES, even though not capable of being sharply defined, may and indeed for purposes of teaching, training and self-discipline, must be distinguished. For the fundamental unity of all the virtues, see GRACES (THE CHRISTIAN), also MAN, §§ 21-25, and RELIGION, §§ 8-12. In framing a list for English Ch. use, it seems advisable to follow as far as possible the lines of the Decalogue as treated in the Catechism. Assigning three virtues and vices to each Comm., a series of thirty is made up, which may for purposes of meditation or self-examination be connected with the days of the month, or the Ten Comms. may be taken three times in a month, or occasionally in a ten days' sequence.

The corresponding virtues and vices must in some cases be qualified by these definitions: e.g., "moderation" is here used specifically in regard to the disposal of one's own or another's time (11), and so would cover mercy towards subordinates, but not temperance in food and drink. Where, moreover, such a table, primarily intended as a guide for the younger members of families, is used by or with older persons, it should be observed that under the 5th Comm. it is the duty of elders to deserve and to require that those under them shall

These can, without much difficulty, be related to other groupings, as indicated by the index figures attached. A. The Seven Virtues: three theological and four cardinal. Faith (1), Hope (2), Charity (3) [cp. GRACES, THE CHRISTIAN]; Prudence (iv, x), Justice (viii), Fortitude (1, 2, 16), Temperance (vii). B. The Seven Deadly Sins. Pride (2), Covetousness (29), Lust (21), Anger (16), Gluttony (19), Envy (18), Sloth (1, 10, 30). C. The Nine Fruits of the Spirit. Love (3, vi), Joy (3, 6, 29), Peace (11, vi), Long-suffering (16), Gentleness (13, 25), Goodness (17), Faith (1, 23), Meekness (18), Temperance (vii). D. The Seven Gifts of the Spirit. Wisdom (1), Understanding (4), Counsel (5), Strength (6), Knowledge (9), Godliness (3), Fear of the Lord (2). These last (in 1s. 11 the characteristic gifts needed by the pattern ruler) are not so sharply distinguished from one another as most of the qualities in other groupings; and in the Confirm. Pr. they are best taken, not as a comprehensive or exhaustive list, but as typical instances of that fulness of Divine endowment which the Spirit distributes to the members of the Body severally as He will, and according to their needs.—K3. have considerable importance as evidence of the contemporary view of Ch. law and episcopal authority. Frere and Kennedy, in their valuable collection (VAI, 3 vols., 1909), have made a sufficient exhibition of them from 1538 to 1573; Dr. Frere's full introd. and the exhaustive index add greatly to the value of the compilation. Other later examples are found in the Ritual Commission's 2nd Report, 1871. Not a few are in Cardwell's DA, and Wilkins' Concilia is another still more extensive treasury. There is room, however, for a careful edition of (say) Cosin's standard set after 1662, compared with four or five typical sets before 1662, and one or two later ones. Sets by Shaxton, Ridley, Bonner (1542), Parker, Bancroft, and Laud might be chosen for the earlier period; and Gibson's, Philpott's, and Bp. J. Wordsworth's would serve for later times. Cp. INJUNCTIONS (ROYAL), and RITUAL LAW, § 5.—A4. G. HARFORD.

VISITATION OF THE SICK.—V. of the sick is the duty of every Christian, as our Lord's practise the virtues specified, and under the 7th Comm. married persons need to combine with the specific virtues assigned to it a particular and intense application in regard to one another of the virtues attached to the 6th.

own sayings and example show. His words in the Parable on the Future Judgment are addressed to all, "I was sick, and ye visited me"; and His example in going about "doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil" is to be humbly imitated by all his servants, whether ordained ministers or not. But it is obvious that men who have been called by the Holy Ghost to Holy Orders should make it their first duty to attend upon and minister to the sick among Christ's flock. In the Church of England this is held so strongly that the parish priest who does not respond to the call of the sick thereby invalidates his ministry.

We shall consider then:

- A. The minister's own preparation: (a) general, (b) particular.
- B. The main points he ought to dwell upon with all sick people (cp. "Order for the V. of the Sick"). These are: (a) God's Purpose, (b) A sense of sin, (c) Repentance and Absolution, (d) Duties to be enjoined.

A. (a) The minister's paramount need is a constant serenity and freedom of mind and heart—neither troubled by worldly cares and ambitions, nor engrossed with social claims—

2. The Minister's General Preparation.

"A heart at leisure from itself

To soothe and sympathise."

For no particular preparation can avail much, unless grounded on habitual piety towards God and man in the depths of the soul. His habitual state of mind must be congruous with the requirements of a call to minister to the sick or dying, often with little or no warning. And in our present conditions of social life he will, whilst taking a kindly share in the ordinary interests and amusements of his people, be jealous lest these ever encroach upon his supreme duty and vocation. His general preparation must also include a knowledge of his people's ways of life and habits of mind. The condition of a man's mind and heart in sickness is generally the outcome of his previous life and surroundings; the pastor should be able to approach him with a knowledge of these (see VISITATION, PASTORAL).

A. (b) The minister's particular preparation should be after the manner of a good physician's, who before he starts on his rounds turns over in mind the cases he means to visit, and the particular treatment needed by each. The priest must pray and must meditate beforehand, that the illumination of the Holy Spirit may be with him; and indeed this illumination must be his one equipment when called upon, as he may be from time to time, to minister to strangers. "It shall be given unto him in that hour what he shall speak."

B. (a) "Sick people are often little disposed to turn to spiritual matters. This temper arises either from acute pain, or consequent prostration—or they are ignorant—or they have been habitually careless" (Dr. Vaughan's Notes on Sick Visiting).

Hence our PB Office wisely dwells upon the Divine Purpose in sickness as the primary truth to be pressed home. The intention of God's visitation of sickness is always remedial. In our Lord's words "sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God." Death is not its final object and end.

Bodily death may intervene; but it is not the real purpose of the visitation. That is the glory of God by the betterment of men's souls—the soul of the sick person, and the souls of his friends.

B. (b) In Divine irony our Lord said, "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Our Church, therefore, devotes the greater part of her Office to impressing upon the sick person a sense of sinfulness, and urging contrition and repentance. Every experienced visitor knows how great a difficulty faces him here. The two great deficiencies of our modern life are the lack of a sense of sin, and consequently of contrition. Gross and violent offences are less common than formerly; but a mean and poor view of moral obligation, petty selfishness and deceit, want of chastity and temperance—all these are frequent. And thus it is often exceedingly difficult to bring any sense of sinfulness home to sick persons. But a sense of sin there must be, if God's visitation of sickness is to have its proper remedial effect; for if there is no contrition there can be no consolation—no deliverance from the moral bondage of sickness, or from the black curtain of approaching death. No rule can be laid down for finding the best avenue to a man's conscience who lies in this state—only direct contact with his soul will disclose it; but personal prayer on his behalf before attending him will do much.

B. (c) Where true contrition exists, REPENTANCE will follow. Accordingly our Office next directs the minister to examine the sick person, whether he truly believes all the articles of the Catholic Faith, and whether he repents him truly of his sins, and is in charity with all the world. The great aim of our Office is to make the sick person's contrition genuine and thorough; and to this end it is provided that he be moved to make a special acknowledgment, "if he feel his conscience troubled by any weighty matter; after which confession, the priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it) after this sort." Here discretion is left to the sick person whether he shall make particular Conf., and to the priest whether he shall use the particular words of Absol. which follow. Some form of Absol. in the manner of the PB he will probably use, but not necessarily in the precise words given in the Office, though some authorities hold that the words "after this sort" limit the form of Absol. to that given in the service.

6. Repentance and Absolution.

B. (d) The duties to be enjoined on the sick person are these: (1) to ask forgiveness for offences and to make amends for wrongs done;

7. Duties to be Enjoined.

(2) to see that provision is made for settling his worldly affairs; (3) to be liberal to the poor.

All these will be the natural preliminaries to the HC (see art. SICK, COMMUNION OF).

[For the Office, see art. SICK, VISITATION OF.]

VISITATION, PASTORAL.—Pastoral V. is exactly what the words imply. It is the work of the Shepherd going in and out

1. Its Nature. amongst his flock. It has been always recognised in the Church as a paramount duty of the Christian Ministry. Nothing less, indeed, could be its position, in view of that we may call the charter of Pastoral work, contained in our Lord's solemn words to St. Peter: "Feed my lambs—Shepherd my sheep—Feed my sheep"—words which again are pressed home in our PB Office for the Ordering of Priests. Their charge is to be "messengers, watchmen and stewards of the Lord, to teach and to premonish, to feed and to provide for the Lord's family; to seek for Christ's sheep that are scattered abroad, and for his children who are in the midst of this naughty world, that they may be saved through Christ for ever."

Taking then a general view of Pastoral V., we may inquire:

A. What is its ideal?

B. What is its scope, and what are its aims, in the present day?

C. What are its methods?

D. What are its difficulties?

E. What are its encouragements?

A. Its ideal is to present and to bring near, to all sorts and conditions of people the Personality and Presence of our Lord and

2. Its Ideal. Saviour. The visiting minister as sent by the Church is His humble representative in the home, and has to show forth the Christ-like character in the midst of the common circumstances of life. The Ideal of V., therefore, is distinct from, though complementary to, that of ministration in church and school, for it is conditioned by the familiar surroundings and various and multiform occasions of family and individual life. It is, in short, to bring the Life of the Saviour into vital contact with the people's life. In George Herbert's incomparable words, "A Pastor is the Deputy of Christ for the reducing of man to the obedience of God" (Priest to the Temple, ad init.).

B. The Parish Clergyman has in this country a unique position; it is his privilege to knock at the door of every house in his parish. He may be refused admittance—but he has the right to knock. Hence there is no material limit to his V. And, as in England no one is outside the sphere of the Church of England, every person has a right to the ministrations of the clergyman of his parish. Hence there are no moral or spiritual limits to the Pastor's V. The scope of it in his parish is only limited by his strength and will, and by his people's acceptance. But in the present day an important question arises, How far should the clergyman offer his pastoral service to persons whom he knows to be either (a) openly hostile to all religion, or (b) antagonistic to the teaching of the Church of England?

In regard to the first (a): The Parish Priest must put Christ's message before his flock, "whether they will hear or whether they will forbear." But it must be borne in mind that people are often far from hostile to religion who do not attend a place of worship. As has been truly said lately, "The number of persons in our own country who seldom enter church or chapel, but who nevertheless are earnestly endeavouring to conform their lives to the standard of Christianity, as they understand it, is probably greater now than it has been at any period in the past."

(b) As to religious persons who have difficulties and objections with regard to the teaching of the Church, it is very often from sheer lack of understanding what that teaching is, that objections are made. Everything points then to the Pastor's taking both these classes of persons, with judgment and discretion, into the scope of his V. It must not be limited to Church-goers, or persons already disposed to worship in church; but must include people who, though they may appear outwardly indifferent or even hostile, may by pastoral intercourse be found ready, and in time eager, to accept the message of the Gospel from him.

C. The unit of the parish is not the individual, but the family; hence the pastor must be in vital touch with as many families

4. Its Methods. as possible. The head of the family is the husband and father. The pastor must therefore visit especially the master of each household. His visits must be generally when the father is at home, if families are to be won to the Church. Night visiting is thus, in the case of working people, imperative. Kindly visits to the women in the afternoon are well enough, but the chief work lies in the evening, man to man.

For it will generally (and rightly) be found that the husband and father and bread-winner is the most important person in the family, and therefore his co-operation is the chief element in its religious development, though it may often be the last secured. It is of course profoundly true that the work of the Gospel is individual; but the best access to individuals is in most cases through their family relations. This is evident through all ages of the Church in the dealings of Almighty God Himself with His people—as in the family of Abraham—as in the Holy Family at Nazareth, and in many instances of families, mentioned in the NT, in the first days of the Christian Church. Above all, this dealing with families was our Lord's method; He constantly visited people at their homes, and treated each family as in a special relation to Himself. It will be found that the pastor who is intimate with the family gradually becomes the personal friend of each member of it; so that at last all the joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears, of all members of the family are naturally communicated to him, and appeal to his sympathy and his prayers. Thus also he will be enabled to exercise the rights of a personal friend; to say many things, to proffer advice or reproof, which would naturally be regarded and even resented as an intrusion from a stranger, albeit a clergyman. The first accost of the pastor is therefore of very great moment. It must, as our Lord directs, express peace; peace to the home. The pastor's attitude brings peace, because it must be one of personal humility and courtesy combined with a deep sense of the greatness of his office. The first impression he produces will often determine whether his ministrations shall be accepted or not. In this connection it is well to note how the wise and temperate teaching of the Church of England concerning individual Conf. of sin can be helped and furthered by pastoral V. A person, young or old, who "cannot quiet his own conscience, but requireth comfort or counsel," will "open his grief" to a minister whom he knows and trusts as a friend, and whose humility and holiness encourage him to come; and thus through "the ministry of God's holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice." Nothing is more important than the pastor's readiness to meet such appeals; for often under the smooth surface of a well-ordered home grave troubles of mind and soul are seething. For the rest, in his dealing with the inner life of his flock, the pastor must humbly imitate the infinite tact and wisdom, the patience and forbearance, of the Pastor Pastorum.

D. The difficulties of Pastoral V. will necessarily vary with the antecedents and actual qualifications of the individual pastor; but some may be noted in general terms.

5. Its Difficulties.

(1) Visiting the educated and well-to-do. The ordinary life of a well-to-do English family of average education does make openings for the message of the Gospel difficult. Life is very full, and there are many calls of business and pleasure; but the family method already referred to will in most cases make a way for a zealous and tactful pastor. It will be generally found that one person in every educated family—although often apparently an insignificant member—may be reached, and thus the initiative of welcome may be gained. But, failing this, an appeal to the master of the house that servants may be visited, and pastoral intercourse established with them—which is itself an important part of the pastor's duty—will often enlist the interest, and perhaps personal effort of the members of the family themselves, till gradually the whole house be won.

(2) The careless. It has been well said "Where the Gospel seems least congruous, there it is most needed." The pastor must have great tact and great courage in approaching men in this case. His own sense of the awful responsibility of life, of his own duty, and also of his own shortcomings, will not allow him to shrink from direct rebuke, notwithstanding that it gives pain.

"Reproof that vex'd not never yet sank deep"—and yet even reproof must be given with courtesy and kindness.

(3) Unbelievers. Some of these are honest and some dishonest. The dishonest unbeliever needs to have his double-mindedness brought home to him. He "does not believe" because he does not wish to face the claim of religion on his attention, or to give up some practices inconsistent with it. But of honest, genuine unbelief there is a great deal at the present time from various causes. It is imperative that the pastor, before attempting to deal with it, should acquaint himself with the conditions and circumstances that have generated it, and trouble the mind; and, whatever these be, great gentleness and tenderness, without any mere self-assertion, must be used by a clergyman in dealing with such minds. Above all, verbal controversy must be avoided. Much may be done by suggesting suitable books for study; also by the appeal by the pastor himself to a wider view of life than is generally taken by persons in this case.

(4) One word in conclusion as to the difficulty of dealing with solitary persons who are not sick. How are they to be reached, as they are apart from family surroundings and influences? If they are young, they can often be reached through employers and comrades—or through clubs, guilds, or classes for instruction. If old, they will generally welcome a friendly visit; little introduction is needed, and it can be supplied by the people with whom they lodge. There are often middle-aged lonely people at work all the week, requiring Sunday visits from the diligent pastor. These will often repay abundantly the pains and time spent upon them; and no people are more grateful, or need the joy of the Gospel more than these.

E. The pastor's encouragements will be increasingly found as he becomes intimate with particular families and persons—especially the God-fearing, whether as communicants or church-workers, and children. Nothing is more refreshing and encouraging to the wearied pastor who has been striving with the careless and indifferent than the welcome he receives from some devout person whom he is accustomed to meet in HC. Such people will often unconsciously give him more than he can give them; and he will also oftentimes receive from such a one valuable suggestions and advice in meeting specific difficulties in his dealing with souls. It is a frequent and encouraging experience in visiting communicants to find that a husband or wife is anxious to bring the other partner to share in HC. It is not seldom found that the one who does not come to Communion has reached mature age without being confirmed; and in preparation for Confirmation and the Communion which follows there is the means of winning a whole family to Christ. No encouragement can be greater to the faithful pastor than to see parents and children all assembled together, through his V., at the Table of the Lord.

6. Its Encouragements.

Encouragement from visiting churchworkers is in proportion to the share which can be given them in the work of the parish. It is evident, in view of the modern requirements of parish organisation, that the work delegated to the laity must be increasingly large, that the pastor may have time, strength and opportunity for his own proper work of V. Whether sick or well, there will always be persons needing his spiritual ministration, and no "service of tables" ought to prevent that.

Lastly: the chief solace and encouragement to a diligent pastor is found in the children of his flock. We have the image of our Lord always before us in this aspect. It is always delightful and always a refreshment to the pastor to go amongst the children. He is to them a true Father in God; and nothing is more helpful to him in his own spiritual life than the answering love of the children whom he has visited and known in their homes from their earliest years. He may rest assured that the fruit of this will long endure, even in many a life of which he must of necessity lose sight in this world. Children, in a wonderful way, prove to us the validity of the Christian religion; recalling to us our Lord's mysterious words, "In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in Heaven."—re.

VISITOR.—Commonly an eleemosynary corporation is subject to the jurisdiction of a Visitor. The V. represents the founder. It is his office to inquire into the conduct of the corporate body, to see that the rules and regulations by which it is governed (as distinct from the laws of the land) are observed, to correct abuses, and to act as arbitrator in the settlement of internal disputes; and for the proper exercise of his office he may make periodic Visitations. The same system of government has been adopted by the Ch.; all spiritual persons, unless they are specially exempted, are subject to the jurisdiction of Vs. The King is the V. of the Abps., the Abps. are Vs. for their provinces, the Bps. for their dioceses, and the ARCHDEACONS for their archdeaconries. The V. need not always act in person; he may act through a delegate, e.g., the Bp. through his CHANCELLOR, the Archdeacon through his OFFICIAL or COMMISSARY. A V. of inferior rank cannot act at all while a V. of superior rank is acting: his jurisdiction for the time being is inhibited. It is the duty of the Bp. to hold a Visitation, if possible, in every third year (canon 60); and he is not permitted to visit more frequently. The Archdeacons hold Visitations in the other years; they cannot hold their Visitations in the year that the Bishop holds his; but the Bp. is relieved of the Visitation work to a large extent by his Chancellor.

For the purpose of Visitation, the clergy are convened as a rule to convenient centres in the diocese about Easter time; the CHURCHWARDENS, old and new, and the SIDESMEN are also cited to attend. Thereupon inquiries are made of the old churchwardens as to the conduct of eccles. matters in their parishes, and they are called upon to make such representations, or presentments, touching the jurisdiction of the V. as they may think fit. To assist them in doing this, canon 119 requires them to be furnished beforehand with suitable articles of inquiry. At the same time, the new churchwardens and sidesmen are admitted to their offices, and the Visitation is concluded by an address or Charge to the assembly by the Visitor.—A5. HUGH R. P. GAMON.

VULGATE.—The name now exclusively given to Jerome's Latin version of the Bible, but formerly applied to the LXX.

Very little is known of the Latin version in use in the Western Ch. prior to the V. Jerome's statement that there were differences between copies may mean that in his days there was only one version, the MS. copies of which showed various readings; but Augustine said that the Itala was the preferable, as if there were more than one, unless, as Burdett suggests, by the Itala, of which nothing further is known, he meant Jerome's Vulgate. Whether there were one or more ancient Latin versions, it is fairly certain that they were of African origin, emanating from the neighbourhood of Carthage, and that they were written in an uncouth, provincial dialect. The influx of converts to the Christian Ch. from the educated classes rendered a more scholarly version of constantly increasing importance.

1. Earlier Versions.

Accordingly Pope Damasus (c. 383) commissioned Jerome, as the most learned doctor of the West, to revise the Gospels of the Old Latin version. It is not absolutely certain whether he restricted himself to the exact terms of his commission, but from his own words it would appear that he went on to revise other portions of the NT besides the Gospels, but in a less thorough way. After this, he proceeded to a revision of the old Latin Psalter, introducing only such alterations as were necessary to make it a true rendering of the Greek text of the LXX. This version, known as the Roman, became very popular in Italy, and continued in use in the churches of Rome until the 16th century.

Dissatisfied with this revision, he proceeded with the preparation of a new version, by comparison with Greek MSS. This new Psalter, from its wide acceptance in Gaul, is known as the Gallican. Still working on the Greek of the LXX, he translated Job, Prov., Eccles., the Song of Songs, and probably all the other canonical books.

About this time he seems to have encountered some Jews, who alleged in controversy that certain passages in the LXX did not represent the original Hebrew. This led him to study Hebrew, and after acquiring a fair working knowledge of the language he retranslated the entire OT from the original tongue. Already the changes introduced by him into the Old Latin Version had occasioned complaint, but when the illiterate and conservative clergy realised that Jerome had abandoned the LXX, which one and all regarded as inspired, these complaints gave way to angry remonstrance. But good work will make its way, and, before the death of the illustrious translator, the new version justified, by its increasing popularity, the title Vulgate, which it has ever since borne.

In some churches the V. text was used for the Gospels, and the Old Latin for other portions of Scripture; in others the V. was employed for the NT and the Old Latin for the OT; while others again used the V. in the Lectionary, and the Old Latin in the Service-books. This parallel use led to endless corruptions. Scribes familiar with the old renderings introduced them into the V., and vice versa. Thus innumerable variations crept into the MSS. National Churches, cut off by seas or mountain ranges from direct communication with their neighbours, evolved peculiar classes of error. Thus, free interpolations of marginal notes and legends mark out the Spanish MSS. from all others. In England and Ireland the text retained more of its original purity; but in France, lying between England and Spain and subject to both influences, peculiarities of the British and Spanish schools united. These differences became so serious that Charles the Great, in 797, instructed Alcuin to prepare a new standard text for the whole Western world. This scholar, having received his education in York where the text was comparatively pure, procured MSS. to work on from that city; but Theodulph, Bishop of Orleans, who started independently on the same task, adopted the corrupt French text. The manifest superiority of Alcuin's, backed as it was by royal authority, led to its immediate acceptance. Both Alcuin and Theodulph confined their labours to the comparison of Latin MSS., so that their work was soon accomplished. So great was the demand for Alcuin's revision that innumerable copies were made of it, with such haste, and with such indifferent attention to detail, that countless errors crept in, and the last state quickly became worse than the first. From this time frequent efforts were made to restore the text, but until the invention of printing with small success. Thus, Lanfranc, Stephen Harding and Cardinal Nicolaus tried to purge out the errors, and during the 12th and 13th centuries combined efforts for the same object were made by the Paris theologians, by the Doctors of the Sorbonne, and by the Dominican and Franciscan Friars.

3. Later Corruptions.

The first printed editions were prepared from cheap MSS., and are full of errors. The most important printed editions are the

4. The Printed Vulgate and the Council of Trent.

Mazarine, 1452; the Venice, 1475; the Complutensian polyglot, 6 vols. folio, 1514; the V. of Stephanus (the first attempt at a critical edition), 1528; and the V. of John Hentenius, folio, 1547. Stephanus' editions of 1538-40 form the basis of the various official editions since issued. The Council of Trent, by its decree "de editione et usu sacrorum librorum," officially adopted the V. as the only "authentic" version, meaning by this term, official and reliable. It was the wish of the Tridentine Fathers that such an edition should be prepared as would render reference to the Greek and Hebrew originals unnecessary. Under the direction of Sixtus V the work of revision proceeded steadily, and in 1590 the Sistine edition appeared, prefaced by a Bull, in which this edition was pronounced to be the authentic copy sanctioned by the Council of Trent, and ordered in future to be used in debates, public readings, preachings and expositions. In spite of this claim to finality, only two years elapsed before the Sistine edition was recalled by Pope Clement, under the influence of Bellarmine, and another, known as the Clementine, partly based on the edition of Hentenius, was put forth in its place. At the present time a further revision is under consideration.

The preface to the AV, speaking of the errors and deficiencies of the Old Latin text, says,

"This moved St. Hierome, a

5. Sources. most learned Father, and the best linguist without controversy of his age or of any other that went before him, to undertake the translating of the OT out of the very fountains themselves; which he performed with that evidence of great learning, judgment, industry, and faithfulness, that he hath forever bound the Church unto him in a debt of special remembrance and thankfulness." In translating the NT, Jerome was influenced by an Italian revision of the European family represented in the Gospels by Codex Brixianus, but he had also other authorities of which we know nothing, as there are passages in which he has made corrections against all known MSS. In his translation of the OT he used a good Hebrew MS., together with the translations of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, sometimes striking a mean between these authorities and the Old Latin. To recover among the numerous extant and ancient MSS. the actual rendering of Jerome is a task of almost hopeless difficulty. The language of the V. is the strong rustic Latin of Jerome's own time, nervous and masculine.

The chief vernacular renderings of the V. are the Rhemish and Douay into English, and the Jansenist French of De Sacy.

It has been inferred from the great influence of the AV on the language of England that the

V. must have exercised a similar effect prior to the Reformation; but this is to forget that the V., though expounded and translated by the Preaching Orders, was still a book in a tongue unknown to the common people. It is unquestionably true that a large number of V. terms are found also in the PB. The question is, "Did they find their way there direct from the V. or did they creep in in some other manner?" To answer this the writer selected 100 common Theological terms from all parts of the PB and submitted them to careful examination. The whole of these words were of common occurrence in the Romance languages, and were presumably introduced by the Norman invaders. Very few, and these of slight importance, could be traced in Anglo-Saxon writers, although the V. was in Saxon times as much the Bible of the Church as during the Middle Ages. Out of the 100 selected words, 85 were ultimately traceable through the Romance Languages to Classical Latin, 69 being found in some kindred sense in Cicero, while only 15 were purely ecclesiastical. Although, as has been said, scarcely any could be found in Anglo-Saxon writers, 26 of the 100 were in Gower's Confessio Amantis, 24 others in Chaucer's Tales, 21 others in the tracts of Wicliffe (excluding direct quotations from the V.), and 6 which could not be found in these writers were discovered in Piers Ploughman, making a total of 77 per cent. in common secular usage by popular writers. There is not a shadow of evidence that any of these terms came through the direct influence of the V. into every-day use or into the PB either.

The only actual incorporation of V. terms in the PB is to be found in the Latin titles to the Psalms, retained as a guide in the selection of the appropriate music, which was catalogued under the first words of the Latin version.

If, however, the direct influence of the V. on the PB was slight, the indirect doctrinal influence cannot be overestimated. The compilers of the PB had been brought up under the influence of Scholastic

Divinity, nine-tenths of which they took over as obviously conforming to the doctrines of Holy Scripture. In the Consecration Pr. in the PB, the words Redemption, Sacrifice, Oblation, Satisfaction, are all terms common in Scholastic Divinity. Satisfaction is not a V. term, but is very frequent in Anselm, and in secular literature. The derivation of PB theological terms may therefore be thus summarised. (a) Jerome adopted current theological terms in his translation. (b) The presence of these terms in the V., confirmed by traditional usage, led to their regular use in the writings of the later

Ch. Fathers. (c) The Schoolmen, later on, adopted these terms, not because they were to be found in the V., but because they were those used by Divines of repute. (d) Through the Norman invasion and the influence of Scholasticism on English thought, these words became familiar in England long before the Reformation. (e) Finally, they were taken over by the Reformers and by the compilers of the PB. The matter is of importance, because it has been argued that the so-called "Sacerdotalism" of the PB is due to the direct influence of the V., and represents a form of belief unscriptural in character, foisted upon Holy Scripture by Jerome from corruptions and developments belonging to his own time; whereas the Reformers and the compilers of the PB rejected the V., and if they adopted its phraseology did so unconsciously, and because Theology in their day had no other vocabulary.

WAFER.—The form that the Unleavened Euch. Bread took at an early date in the Latin Church was that of round Ws. made of fine wheat flour and water, baked between heated irons, and marked with some sacred sign. Symbolism has often had to yield to considerations of convenience and comeliness. No doubt the spiritual unity of Christians was held, perhaps in apostolic days, to be symbolised by their all being fed at the Lord's Table from one loaf, and all being given to drink from one cup. But it is clear that this symbolism could be conveniently maintained only when a very moderate number of communicants had to be provided for, and the dividing up of the Consecrated Bread into the necessary morsels must often have been a tedious and scarcely edifying addition to the service. In view of all this, the Latin Church frankly abandoned any attempt to maintain the primitive symbolism, and adopted the use of a small separate W. for each communicant, a larger W. being provided for the celebrant: This was the use of the Church of England in the 16th cent., and the PB of 1549 expressly continued it, stipulating for some changes in the manufacture of the W., the object of which is not very obvious. Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions (1559) required the employment of W. bread, and there is abundant evidence of its continued use at least down to the middle of the 17th cent. If Abp. Temple's interpretation of the meaning of our present Rubric (see art. UNLEAVENED BREAD) be tenable, the use of W. bread is still lawful in the Church of England.—H2. T. I. BALL.

WAND.—A long strip of wood, sometimes painted, carried by a churchwarden as a symbol of his office.—R3. J. W. TYRER.

WAR.—In considering the Christian attitude in respect of military operations, reference may be permitted to the 37th Art. (q.v.). Tertullian, in his treatise De Corona Militis, argues against the lawfulness of a Christian engaging in war, but in his Apology he refers to the habit of Christians enlisting in the Roman armies and Roman navies. Nowhere in the NT is there any injunction against the military profession. Our Lord and St. Paul both refer to the customs of war in illustration of the Christian warfare. We have in the PB intercessions with regard to military and naval undertakings. In the Lit. there are these words, "From battle and murder and from sudden death, good Lord deliver us." There are in the "Prayers and Thanksgivings upon several occasions" a Pr. for use in time of war and tumults, and a Thanksgiving for the blessings of peace. We may also recall the Pr. for victory in the Service for those at Sea. Incidentally we may note that in the Pr. for the King or Queen, as also in the Accession Service, indications of this spirit of hopefulness in military operations are manifest, while in the Veni Creator we may even trace its use in time of war, a use which we have reason to believe was customary in the despatch of troops to the fight. The main thought which runs through the petitions in respect of seeking the help of God is the humble desire that just engagement in such operations shall be a necessary qualification for intercession. It is not so much victory over opposing forces as the triumph of right over wrong. The words of the Pss. are constantly recurring in those prayers. —K3⁶. G. J. HOWSON.

WASHING OF HANDS.—See HANDS, § 1.

WATER, HOLY.—To wash or sprinkle persons or things with W. consecrated for the purpose, in sign of their religious purification and dedication to the service of the Divinity, is a rite of such general prevalence from the remotest antiquity that it may almost be said to belong to universal religion. The place given to this symbolical use of lustral water in the rites of the old Law, and the august sanction conferred on it by the divine institution of the Sacr. of Bapt., make it easy to understand that at an early date, probably before the 5th cent., it found its way to a place among the rites of the Christian Church, both East and West. In the West, HW. was used for the lustration of the people before divine service and at other times, and sprinkling with it formed part of every ceremony of consecration or benediction. In mediæval times the use of HW. was one of the most constantly recurring practices of our national religion. The PB of 1549 made no provision of any kind for the continuance of this custom, nor contained any allusion to it. The Church of England has never canonically condemned nor repudiated the use of HW., but doubtless the extraordinary efficacy popularly ascribed to it appeared to be superstitious to the reforming divines, and it was thought wise quietly to drop the use of it out of the authorised formularies altogether.—R2. T. I. BALL.

WEDNESDAY.—See WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 3.

WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN.—In Greek and Latin the Christian usage is to have special names for Sunday, Friday and

1. Names of Saturday; in Syriac for the last two only; the other days are known by their numbers. Thus we have: κυριακή, δευτέρα, τρίτη, τέρτη, πέμπτη, παρασκευή, σάββατον; dominica, feria secunda, etc., parasceve (or feria sexta), sabbatum. The Syriac names are: "one-in-the-week," "two-in-the-week," etc., "rübhtā" (lit. "the eve"), "shabhtā" (sabbath). But Justin, Tertullian, and other apologists, writing to the heathen, use "dies solis," ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρα (Justin, I Apol. 67), for the Lord's day, and it is so called by Constantine (Eusebius, Vit. Const. 4 18 ff.) and in the Theodosian Code. In Sozomen (HE 1 8) we read of "the Lord's day, which the Jews call the first day of the W., and which the Greeks dedicate to the sun." The pagan names of the days of the W. were, however, sometimes used by Christians; see DCA 2 1032. The day named "sabbath" in Christian and Jewish writings is our Saturday; but in a rhetorical passage in the Ethiopic Didascalia (ed. Platt, 6 10), the Lord's day is called the "Christian sabbath." Friday is called προσάββατον in Epiphanius (cited below, § 3).

The first day of the week appears to have been observed from Apostolic times, even though Jewish Christians continued to keep

2. Sunday. the Sabbath. It was observed as the weekly commemoration of the Resurrection (note the emphasis in Jn. 20 1, 19); it was the occasion of the second appearance of our Lord to the disciples (Jn. 20 26) and of the descent of the Spirit (Acts 2 1); it was the day of the Christian synaxis or meeting for worship (this is doubtless the force of 1 Cor. 16 2) and for the Euch., probably also for the Agape (cp. Acts 20 7 and 20 11). It seems to have been the day of St. John's vision in Patmos (Rev. 1 10), though other interpretations have been offered. Early references to the observance of Sunday are in Barnabas 15 9; in Didache 14 and Justin (I Apol. 67) where the synaxis is mentioned; in Ignatius, Magn. 9, where it is implied; and in Pliny, Ep. 96, where the assembly "stato die" is doubtless the Sunday synaxis. Indeed, for a long time, probably till the 4th cent., Sunday was the only regular day for public worship (DCG 1 233a); this is made still more probable if (as now seems likely) the Canons of Hippolytus in their present form date from that cent. Sunday was the day for ordination in the Church Orders (DCG, ib.). One of Constantine's most notable actions (A.D. 321) was to issue edicts ordering Sunday to be observed as a day of rest and worship, and Friday to be honoured; even pagan soldiers were to pray publicly on Sunday, and legal business was not to be carried on (Euseb., Vit. Const. 4 18-23; Sozomen, HE 1 8). Later emperors caused the circus and theatres to be closed and forbade races on that day. On Sunday, as during Eastertide (see FESTIVAL, § 23), kneeling and fasting were forbidden: see Tertullian, De Cor. 3, De Orat. 23; the older Didascalia 5 14 (ed. Funk, 1, p. 278); Test. of our Lord 2 12 (not explicit; c. 350?); Apost. Const. 5 20 (c. A.D. 375), Nicene can. 20; Basil, De Spir. S. 27 66; Council of Caesarea Augusta (Saragossa), A.D. 380 (can. 2); Cassian, Inst. 2 18; Augustine, Ep. 55 32 Ben., ad Januar. (119 17). The Sunday rest is first mentioned by Tertullian (Apol. 16, De Orat. 23).

Wed. and Fr. appear as fasts almost from the Apostolic period. They are prescribed in the

2. Wednesday and Friday. Didache (8) as an equivalent to the practice among the stricter Jews of fasting on Monday and Thursday (cp. Lk. 18 12). Heras (Sim. 5 1) speaks of keeping a "station," i.e., a fast, but does not say on which day of the week. Tertullian calls Wed. and Fr. "station days," a military metaphor meaning that the Church is on guard, and "half fasts" (semijejunia, De Orat. 19, De Jejun. 2, 13 f.). The latter phrase means that there was total abstinence from food till 3 p.m., or perhaps in some places till noon; and this was the reason for afternoon Eucharists, that the people might be encouraged to fast till then. These two days are also mentioned as fasts by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 7 12), the older Didascalia (5 14; ed. Funk, 1, p. 276), Peter of Alexandria (Ep. Canon. 13, early 4th cent.), Canons of Hippolytus 20 134, Epiphanius (Haer. 65 6, Exp. Fid. 21), Origen (in Lev. Hom. 10; but we have this only in Rufinus' Latin, and therefore this is only 4th cent. evidence), Apost. Const. 5 15, 20, 7 23, Apost. Canons 69, Arab. Didasc. 38, Pseudo-Ignatius, Philipp. 13. The reasons given for the choice of these days vary. Thus, of the Alexandrians, Clement (l.c.) makes the two fasts a protest against heathen covetousness and voluptuousness symbolised by the days being named after Hermes and Aphrodite (Mercury and Venus); Peter (l.c.) ascribes the choice to the fact of the conspiracy of the Jews and the Crucifixion having taken place in those days. But these are clearly afterthoughts, at any rate except as regards Friday. Probably, when the Jewish fasting days were adopted and changed by the Christians, Friday was chosen for the reason given by Peter of Alexandria, and then Wednesday was taken merely for convenience. There is, however, evidence that in some countries these fasts were dropped, or perhaps that they never were universal. They are by implication negated by the silence of the Test. of our Lord, though we find them in the Arab. Didascalia, which is derived from the Testament. In Tertullian these days are set apart for the Euch. (De Orat. 19); and so Arab. Didasc. 38, and several of the 4th and 5th cent. Fathers. In the Edessene Canons (c. A.D. 350) they are days for public prayer (can. 2, 3), but neither Euch. nor fast are mentioned there. The Pilgrimage of "Silvia" (c. A.D. 385) mentions Wed. and Fr. Eucharists in Lent (4 3). At Alexandria there were no Eucharists on these days up to the 5th cent., though there were synaxes and preaching (Socrates, HE 5 22, but some think that he refers here to Holy Week only).

The Wednesday (and Saturday) fast died out early in the West except in Lent and at the Ember seasons (see EMBER DAYS). For the decree of Constantine ordering Friday to be honoured, see above, § 2.

The special observance of Thursday with a morning Euch. as a commemoration of the Last Supper is not primitive. To those who began their

4. Thursday. day at sunset rather than at midnight the Last Supper would have been considered to have taken place at the beginning of Friday, and the evening celebration on Maundy Th.

(see HOLY WEEK) in reality belonged to Friday. Hence Friday became a "liturgic" day rather than Thursday (see above, § 3). Before the 8th cent. there was mass in Rome every week-day in Lent except on Thursday, as we see in the oldest MS. of the Gelasian Sacramentary (Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 130). Thursdays in Lent were first liturgically observed in Rome by Gregory II (A.D. 715-731). The Greeks do not observe them with Euch. (see LENT, § 4).

Considerable diversity is found in Christian antiquity as to the treatment of Saturday.

5. Saturday. From the 2nd cent. onwards we find the tendency to make it a fast in the West, a festival in the East. Tertullian as a Montanist blames the "Psychics" (the Catholics) for fasting on Saturday, and says that this should never be done except "in Pascha" (i.e., on Easter Even). Socrates (HE 5 22) says that in his day it was a fast in Rome. The Saturday fast was an extension of that of Friday and was called "superpositio"; the phrases "continuate jejunium," "superponere" (ὑπερθεθεῖν) jejunium, were used. These "superpositions" were regulated by an obscure canon of Elvira (c. A.D. 305, can. 23). Jerome (Ep. 71, ad Lucinium) says that Hippolytus had discussed the Saturday question, but he does not give his results. On the other hand, Saturday is found as a festival in Apost. Const. (5 20) and Pseudo-Ignatius (Philipp. 13), where fasting on this day is vehemently forbidden except in Holy Week; in Apost. Can. 64; and Socrates (HE 6 8: "the festal days—I mean the Sabbath and the Lord's day").

Saturday in the East was a special day for a synaxis, usually for the Euch.; this was so at Constantinople and in Syria, but not in Rome and Alexandria. In Egypt the custom seems to have changed in the 4th cent. Athanasius' language (Apol. con. Arian. 11) shows that in his time Sunday was the only fixed day at Alexandria for the Euch., but at the end of the cent. Cassian (Inst. 3 2) says that the Egyptians had no public service except on Saturdays and Sundays, when they met at the third hour for the Euch. Socrates, in the 5th cent., says that Saturday Eucharists were almost universal, but that they were not held in Alexandria or Rome because of an ancient tradition (HE 5 22; cp. Sozomen, HE 7 19, who says that at Constantinople they had Saturday synaxes). There is a Saturday Euch. in the Test. of our Lord 1 23, and the Arab. Didascalia 38; the synaxis, but not the Euch., on this day is mentioned in Apost. Const. 2 59. Augustine testifies to varying custom; some (he says) had the Euch. on Sunday only, some on Saturday and Sunday, some daily (Ep. 54 2 Ben., ad Januar.). Tertullian says (De Orat. 23) that some abstained from kneeling on Saturday. For Saturdays in Lent and for the Euch. then, see LENT, §§ 2, 4.

WELSH VERSION OF THE PB.—There is no evidence that a vernacular Liturgy was ever in use in any portion of the Celtic Ch.; such pre-Norman fragments as have survived are all in Latin. The supposed Missal (c. 1400), as well as the Pontifical (13th cent.), of Bangor (see USE, § 16) are entirely in Latin; and the so-called Welsh Missæ of St. David and of St. Teilo, in MSS. of the early 13th and the 15th cents., are also in that language. There are Welsh versions of the Lord's Pr., the Ath. Cr., and the 10 Comms., of the 14th cent., and mid-15th cent. MSS. of a trans. of the Officium Parvum, or the Hours, attributed to Dafydd Ddu Hiraddug (flor. 14th cent.). In 1546 appeared a Prymer, compiled by Sir John Price, the first book published in the Welsh language. But all these were only for use in private.

In 1551 appeared the Liturgical Eps. and Gospels (Kynniver Llith a Ban), trans. by a layman, Wm. Salesbury, and followed in 1562 by the Litany. In the same year an Act was passed providing that the four Welsh Bps. and the Bp. of Hereford (then largely a Welsh diocese) should take such order amongst themselves that the whole Bible and PB be truly and exactly trans. into Welsh, and a copy of each placed, at the joint expense of the parson and parishioners, in every ch. and chapel, where required, before March 1st, 1566. The time was much too short to accomplish so great an undertaking, but in 1567 the PB and NT appeared. The PB was translated, probably in its entirety, by Bp. Rich. Davies of St. David's from the Eng. PB of 1559, and printed "at the costes and charges of Humfrey Toy." The Eps. and Gospels are not the 1551 version, nor that of the NT of 1567 (in which Salesbury had the principal hand), nor even from the Eng. PB, but an independent translation; the Pss. are direct from the Hebrew. (Until 1588 the First Lesson was still read in English.) At least four copies of the 1567 PB exist, but none are perfect; of the 2nd ed., 1586, copies are fairly numerous.

Between 1567 and 1800, forty-eight eds. of the Welsh PB are recorded as having been issued, mainly from London and Shrewsbury. The most important are those of 1567, 1599 (3rd ed.), 1621 (4th), 1664 (7th), and 1710 (15th); to which must be added those of 1809 and 1841. The 1599 ed. was revised to agree, though not entirely, with Bp. Morgan's Bible, 1588. In the 1621 ed. the Eps., Gospels and Pss. are taken from Bp. Parry's Bible (1620), which is now recognised as the Welsh AV. All three Psalters were thus trans. direct from the Hebrew, the only portions from the Great Bible being the additions (within brackets) in Pss. 13 and 14. The PB of 1621 is supposed to have been edited by Bp. Parry and Dr. John Davies, and bound with it is the first ed. of Archdn. Edm. Prys's Metrical Pss. (mainly in the "Ps. Measure"), which is still popular and accorded a large place in every Welsh hymnal. Its precursors, Myddelton's and Kyffin's (the latter only the first 13 Pss.), both published in 1603, were utterly unsuitable for public worship.

The ACT OF UNIFORMITY, 1662, ordered the five Bps. to have the Annexed PB trans. bef.

May 1st, 1665; but the translation appeared in 1664, probably undertaken by Bp. Geo. Griffith of St. Asaph. By an Act of 1677 the Bps. were again ordered, inter alia, to revise the PB with the Eng. of 1662, and bring the Bible-portions into closer agreement with Bp. Parry's Bible. By far the most important revision of the 18th cent. was Ellis Wynne's (1710), at the request of the Bishops; he added Dr. J. Davies's trans. of the 39 Arts. (first published, separately, 1664) and the Constitutions and Canons. The Welsh PB was further improved by Moses Williams (1718) and Rich. Morris, of the Navy Office, who saw through the press the eds. of 1746, 1752, and 1770—the last being embellished with 54 fine plates, and probably the most beautifully printed Welsh book of the 18th century.

There were two eds. of some importance during last cent.—Tegid's (1809), and that of 1841 undertaken by a committee of four, one from each diocese, appointed by the Bps.; but the verbal alterations made were not very many: this latter is practically the PB of to-day. A further revision was proposed in the Lower House of Conv. in 1890, but nothing came of it. The present Version is substantially the same as that of 1664. It was then that the Sents. in MEP, Easter Anthems, Offertory Sents., and Comfortable Words were taken from the Bible of 1620; but the Cants., Lord's Pr., and 10 Comms. are still, to a great extent, the same as in 1567.

A few peculiarities in the Welsh PB may be mentioned. In the Te Deum the Welsh is often nearer the Lat., e.g., "Gogoneddus gor yr Apostolion" ("Gloriosus Apostolorum chorus"), "Moliannus nifer y Prophwydi" ("Prophetarum laudabilis numerus"). The Ap. Cr. has "Adgyfodiad y cnawd," "the Resurrection of the flesh," as in the Eng. Bapt. Office. In the Coll. for Innocent's Day "infants" are "plant aifafar" = "parvulos non loquendo." According to the rubric bef. the Pr. of Consecration, the Priest is to stand "by the Table" ("wrth y Bwrdd"), and to break the Bread "in the presence of the people" ("yng ydd y bobl")—Eng. 1662 = Welsh 1664. "By His one oblation of Himself once offered" is inaccurately rendered "trwy Ei offrymiad Ei Hun yn offrymedig unwaith" (so 1567) = "by His offering of Himself (or His own offering) once offered." "Hollgyfoethog" (cp. Irish "uile-chumhachtach") is "Almighty" in the sense of the Lat. "omnipotens." "For ever and ever," or "world without end" ("in saecula saeculorum"), is rendered "yn oes oesoedd," "byth bythoedd," or "heb dranc na gorffen" ("without cessation or end"). "Priest" is always translated "offeiriad" = sacerdos.

Taken as a whole, the Version is an excellent specimen of chaste, dignified Welsh. It has its imperfections; but so has the

5. Its Influence.

Welsh Bible. Chief among these has been the too close following of the "verbum verbo reddere," noticeable more especially in the Colls. and Occasional Offices; MEP form the smoothest and most rhythmical portion. But it should be remembered that Bp. Rich. Davies and the rest were confronted with a great difficulty; the language at the time was ill-provided with technical theological terms and phrases; hence certain hybridisms and archaisms. The publication of the PB in Welsh probably did quite as much as that of the Bible to revivify and fix the language; in fact, the trans. of the Liturgy and the Scriptures has, through the translators' linguistic influence, changed the literary dialect from that of the South to that of North Wales.—BI.

WHITSUN OFFERINGS.—In 1903 an effort was launched in promotion of W.O., the intention being to aid the Assistant Clergy on similar lines to the way in which the Easter Offerings have helped the Beneficed Clergy. Considerable support has been given to this new movement.—A6.

WHITSUNDAY, WHITSUNTIDE.—See FESTIVAL, § 22, 23, 24; also next article.

WHITSUNTIDE, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR—

We reach on Whitsunday the last Festival of the historical half of the Christian year: we commemorate the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the disciples of Christ in Jerusalem. The day of Pentecost was reckoned by the Hebrews from the day of the Passover; and so the Christian Festival of Whitsunday is reckoned from Easter. The gift of the Spirit is the supreme gain that comes to us from the risen Lord: by the power of the Holy Ghost we are made partakers of the victory of our Lord; the same power that raised Him from the dead is ours to raise us from the death of sin to a life of righteousness. The Holy Gospel for this day (John 14 15-31) teaches us that obedience to God is that temper which befits and prepares the soul for the habitation of the Spirit; and the Epistle (Acts 2 1-11) tells us that the Spirit came down upon those who were all with one accord in one place—the united and loving fellowship of the disciples. So the NT Lessons (MP, Rom. 8 1-17; EP, Gal. 5 16-26 or Acts 18 24-19 20) exhort us to yield ourselves to the guidance of the Holy Spirit and to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. There is no other way of Christian discipleship but this: the Spirit sanctifies the faithful in Christ Jesus. And the work of the Holy Ghost is this: to prepare redeemed mankind for the Second Advent and the Judgment by producing in men the likeness of Christ. The Feast of Pentecost was a Harvest Festival amongst the Hebrews (MP, First Lesson, Deut. 16 1-17); on this day the conversion of three thousand persons was, as it were, the first harvest of souls after the sowing of Christ's Body in the earth.

The two days of this Festival immediately following Whitsunday take their notes from their Epistles: on the Monday in Whitsun week (Acts 10 34-48) we read of the conversion of Gentiles and the gift of the Holy Ghost bestowed on these converts; on the Tuesday we are told of the conversion of Samaritans and the gift of the Spirit in that city. In the former instance the Holy Spirit came upon the people as they listened to St.

Peter; in the latter the gift of the Spirit was bestowed by the laying on of hands. The Holy Gospel on the Monday (John 3 16-21) recapitulates the story of redemption; its cause, its course, its goal, in face as it were of its crowning endowment, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. The OT Lessons (MP, Gen. 11 1-9; EP, Num. 11 16-30) refer us back in thought to the pride of the builders of Babel which led to confusion of speech and separation, and then to the inspiration of seventy chosen men who were moved by that Spirit which maketh all men to be of one mind in the household of God. The NT Lessons (MP, 1 Cor. 12 1-13; EP, 1 Cor. 12 27-13 13) are both from the first Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, and give us the sustained teaching of that Apostle on the ministration of the Holy Ghost in the Church of Christ. We are now in the dispensation of the Blessed Spirit, and our personal lives are immediately dependent upon the graces conferred upon us by the Spirit. We ought to "covet earnestly the best gifts," not the conspicuous external gifts that attract admiration, but the abiding enrichments of the Christian life—faith, hope and love.

The Epistle for Tuesday in Whitsun Week (Acts 8 14-17) helps us to realise the regular and constant ways of the God of covenant. Condescending to man's condition in this mortal life, God appoints certain ways of blessing, by which He helps and strengthens those who faithfully seek Him. By the laying on of the hands of the Apostles Peter and John, the Holy Ghost was evidently given to the converts in Samaria. The Holy Gospel (John 10 1-10) suggests the same lesson, the appointed order of Shepherd and Fold and Porter. The OT Lessons (MP, Joel 2 21-32; EP, Mic. 4 1-7) are from the prophets Joel and Micah, predicting the final dispensation, and the sanctification of all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. In the NT Lessons (MP, 1 Thess. 5 12-23; EP, 1 John 4 1-13) we have the references made by St. Paul to the work of the Holy Ghost in his earliest Epistle, together with his prayer for the complete sanctification of his readers in body, soul and spirit; and we have the admonitions also of St. John, the latest writer of NT Scriptures, as he warns us not to give ourselves over to false influences, but to discern always the guidance and teaching of the Spirit by the touchstone of fidelity to Christ. So far as we are led by the Spirit we are brought into increasing likeness with Jesus Christ in whom dwells "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." St. John would teach us that the mission of Jesus Christ prepared the way for the coming of the Holy Ghost, and that the ministry of the Holy Ghost is the widening and deepening application of the redemptive work of Jesus Christ.—G39.

WIDOW.—Second marriages were always disliked in the early Ch., and Ws., like virgins, were given a recognised position in the community. They were expected to be regular at worship, to fast and to care for the sick (Can. Hipp. 9 59, 32 157), and to assist women candidates for baptism, though for this purpose deaconesses were preferred (Syr. Didasc. and Apost. Const.). In only one Ch. Order, the Testament of Our Lord, have they any definite place among the clergy at the altar. A limit of age was set, generally 50 to 60 years. In the West they seem more often to have occupied the position of pensioners (cp. the letter of Cornelius, in Euseb., HE. vi. 43). They were not ordained and do not seem to have taken any vows, though they wore a dark dress like the virgins. They were finally absorbed in the monasteries. Many parishes to-day find themselves responsible for pensions to widows, who could probably be usefully employed for a few hours every day as watchers in open churches.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

WILL.—In England, and in England only, the Courts Christian had an exclusive jurisdiction over testamentary causes and over the distribution of the goods of intestates (wills of real estate being always subject to the common law). Eccles. law prescribed the formalities necessary to a valid will, whether written or nuncupative, and required that it be proved in the court of the Ordinary—who might be the dean of a petty PECULIAR, a bp. or an abp. (see canons 92, 126, 134). The probate and testamentary jurisdiction of the eccles. courts was by 20-1 Vict., c. 7, transferred, as from 1 Jan., 1858, to the Probate Court founded by the act (now the Probate Division of the High Court); but in non-contentious cases probate is still granted by the District Registrars of the several dioceses. Some 325 courts possessing probate jurisdiction before 1858 are named, and the extent of their records (if any) indicated, in G. W. Marshall, Handbook to Anc. Courts Probate, 1895.

The minister's duty to exhort sick and sound to make wills is stated in VS, Rubric aft. Creed (cp. canon 84).—A4.

WINE.—See ELEMENTS, MIXED CHALICE.

WORD OF GOD. 1. The Logos, or Word, Wisdom, or Reason, of God, an eternally distinct Subsistence within the Totality of the Godhead, who became flesh and tabernacled among men, the Mediator of both the first and second creations, and the Agent of the final resurrection (John 1 1-14). 2. The creative Fiat (Gen. 1 3, Ps. 33 6, Heb. 11 3). 3. The message of God to prophets and apostles. 4. The Divine element of saving truth in the Bible. 5. By extension, the whole Bible. 6. The message of Christian preachers. Thorndike (1 216) has some useful remarks on the word of God as read and preached: "the one the word of God as the Holy Ghost inspired it, the other no less, so far as it departeth not from that which is written, but always subject, so long as man is subject to error and infirmity, to depart from it. And when this precious wine [of Scripture] is once dashed with the water of human apprehensions, it is no offence to me that it is still called the word of God; for so it should be, and so it is presumed to be, till it appear otherwise: but it will concern every man [i.e., preacher] to look about him, that he pin not on God his own infirmities."—B5. G. HARFORD.

WORDS AND MEANINGS.—Pedants and purists vainly seek to set bounds to the strange ebbs and flowings of the tide of linguistic usage. Each writer may indeed use his terms in what sense he pleases, if he be careful to define that sense, but he is ill-advised who earns a name for splitting hairs or risks grave confusion of meaning out of a sentimental regard for an obsolete or obsolescent term or sense of a term. Readers of older literature, and even of books by contemporaries, can hardly be too careful to make sure that they have grasped the specific sense in which the several authors use their terms. Where a word met with is not clearly defined when first used, and has more than one sense, the mind must hold the ambiguity resolutely unresolved until some later sentence clears it up. Sometimes—more frequently, indeed, than might be supposed—a whole treatise is vitiated by some radical ambiguity of terms. The instances given below of words which have occasioned confusion will abundantly illustrate this possibility.

A few are merely obsolete (2, 24, 31); one or two terms dropped by the PB have been revived (4, 50, 68, cp. Host, Mass, etc.), while others, restricted in meaning within the PB, have been used in wider connotations (22, 60, 63, 64, 67). Many words are used in a sense now obsolete (3, 6, 11, 16-18, 20, 21, 32, 34-36, 41, 43, 46, 48, 52, 54, 57, 58, 61, 65, 68, 72, 73, 75), or liable to be missed because technical (13, 28, 38, 45, 49-51, 56, 60, 66, 67, 70, 71). And a great many possess more than one meaning in current usage (1, 5, 7-10, 12, 14, 15, 19, 23, 25-27, 29, 30, 40, 42, 43, 47, 53, 59, 62-64, 74).

1° ABSOLUTION: 1. Divine loosing from sin; 2. ministerial declaration or invocation of the same. 2° AFFIANCE: trust. 3° ALLOW: 1. PB—approve; ct. 2. permit. 4° ALTAR: 1. place of sacrifice; 2. (Coron., not 1662 PB) Communion Table, as a place where remembrance is made of Christ's sacrifice.

5° BODY: 1. mortal; 2. spiritual or resurrection; 3. Christ's natural B.; 4. His mystical B.; 5. His sacramental B. 6° BRIEF: a short official letter.

WORDS OF ADMINISTRATION.—In the Order of Communion (1548) the words at the delivery of the Bread were: "The

1. Anglican Form. Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee, preserve thy body unto everlasting life"; and at the delivery of the Cup: "The Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was shed for thee, preserve thy soul unto everlasting life." According to Freeman (Principles of Divine Service 2 3) the liturgical source of the distinction is in the York Missal: "The Body and Blood . . . keep my body and my soul unto everlasting life" (cp. Prayer of Humble Access). Dowden (Further Studies, p. 319) quotes from a Missal of Subiaco (A.D. 1075): "The Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul unto everlasting life."

In 1549 the form in both cases was changed into "preserve thy body and soul" (Burnet, History of the Reformation 2, p. 136, Pocock's edition; cp. art. HUMBLE ACCESS, PRAYER OF; and Mozarabic Missal, Migne, PL 120 566-7). In 1552 the second clause: "Take and eat," etc., "Drink this," etc., was substituted for the form of 1549. In 1559 the two were combined (Cardwell's Conferences, pp. 33, 34). In 1661 the Puritans objected to the repetition of the words to each individual. The bishops' answer was that it was the propriety of the Sacraments to appropriate to each believer the merits of Christ's death (Hooker, EP. v. 682; Cardwell, Conferences, p. 354).

The earliest known forms of administration are very simple, e.g., "This is the Body of Christ,"

2. Earlier Forms. "This is the Blood of Christ," the recipient being bidden to respond "Amen" (cp. Canons of Hippolytus 19 146; Tertullian, De Spectaculis 25; Augustine, Contra Faust. 7 10; Eusebius, HE vi. 43 19). In the Clementine Liturgy the words are: "The Body of Christ," "The Blood of Christ, the cup of life (ποτήριον ζωῆς)." In the Roman Church the earliest known form appears in the time of Gregory the Great (Migne, PL 75 103), viz. "The Body of the Lord Jesus Christ preserve (conservet) thy soul"; and a similar form, "guard (custodiat) thy body and soul unto everlasting life" is found in the Pre-Reformation Manuals, though not in the Missals. In the present Roman Church, though there is no rubrical direction, the priest uses the same formula (Ronsée, Prax. Cel. Miss. 2 13; Scudamore, NE, p. 738).

In the Greek Church the ordinary formula is, "The servant of God N. partakes of the precious and holy Body and Blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to the remission of his sins and to eternal life" (Goar, Euchologion, p. 153).—H2. J. F. KEATING.

WORKS OF THE DEVIL.—This phrase is sometimes summarily used to cover all forms of evil, as in Exhs. 3, 4 of Bapt.¹; but it has also a more specific meaning, as contrasted with the temptations of the world and the flesh. In this narrower sense pride, despair, hatred, and deceit would appear to be the forms of evil most properly to be included under the term. Both the narrower and wider senses can be defended. The "prince of this world" uses the world of things and people as well as the sensuous bodily organism as instruments of temptation, but has his peculiar province within the spiritual nature of man. According to the older view the great adversary is strictly a personal being. Many modern theologians would prefer to explain the names and titles used of him as personifications. But the subject cannot here be pursued further.—K1.

G. HARFORD.

WORLD.—The word "world" is used in the PB in different senses. Sometimes, as in the Pr. of St. Chrysostom, it denotes the present life, or the present order of things: sometimes, as in the General Thanksgiving, the human race in general; the word in such cases being used in what may be called a "neutral" sense, i.e., without any moral significance and without any antithesis between the World and the Church.

In a few passages, however, the word occurs in what may be termed the "moral" or "theological" sense—e.g., in the Baptismal Office ("manfully to fight under his banner against sin, the world, and the devil"), in the Catechism (Answer 3, "the pomps and vanity of this wicked world"), and in the Ordering of Priests ("his children who are in the midst of this naughty world"). In these places there is a moral connotation, which in the two last instances is made clear by the addition of an epithet. In this usage the PB reflects the teaching of the NT, and more especially of the Johannine writings, with regard to the World (κόσμος). The word κόσμος is used 177 times in the NT, 102 of the passages occurring in the Johannine writings, and 46 in St. Paul's Epistles. The classical sense of the word was (1) order, constitution; (2) ornament; (3) the universe: and it is often used in this latter sense, or as equivalent to "the human race," in the NT. It is not always possible to separate the passages where it bears this neutral sense from those in which it implies alienation from God, but in many passages it undoubtedly bears this moral significance. Most of them occur in John 14-17, or in 1 John, but some are also found in St. Paul's Epistles, Hebrews, St. James, and St. Peter, where the word is applied either to "the mass of men alienated from God" (John 15 18), or to worldly affairs, pleasures, etc., which lead men astray from God (1 Cor. 7 31, 1 John 2 15). St. Paul also uses the word αἰών (sæculum) in a similar sense, to denote things temporal as opposed to things eternal, while κόσμος (mundus) acquires its moral significance as representing human society in its rejection of God and in its organising itself without reference to His Will.

We do not find the actual words "the Church" and "the World" definitely contrasted in any single phrase of the NT, but the contrast between the body of Christ's disciples which constitutes the Church, and the mass of human society which is alienated from God, is emphasised both by St. John and by St. Paul. St. John represents our Lord as sent into the World, which was lying in darkness, to be its Light. The effect of His mission was to separate those who loved light from those who loved darkness. The Church, in continuing Christ's work, was also to be the light of the World; and the Holy Spirit was to convince the World concerning sin and righteousness and judgment. Hence there is the contrast and antagonism between the Church and the World which finds its fullest expression in the Apocalypse, where the antagonism is accentuated by the persecution which the World-power, as represented by Imperial Rome, has already begun against the Church.

See CHURCH; also notes in Bp. Westcott's Commentaries on St. John's Gospel and Epistles, esp. note on John 1 10; Hobhouse, The Church and the World, Bampton Lectures, 1909, pp. 22-23, 352-354. [Cp. ORDER §§ 12-14.]—K1.

WALTER HOBHOUSE.

WORSHIP, DUTY OF PUBLIC.

The argument for the existence of God, known briefly as "a consensu gentium," bears its

1. Natural Religion and Scripture. unimpeachable witness to the instinct in man which compels his acknowledgement of that Higher Power which brought him into existence and is his Preserver as well as being his Creator. It is not a long step to the acknowledgment of the duty of Worship. Such, briefly, may be the fair inference of natural religion. Revealed religion supplements this extensively and minutely. The specific directions of the Mosaic code (even to the details of the incense ingredients) manifest clearly the logical outcome of the foundation-principle of Worship. The OT bears its abundant testimony to this duty, and our Lord, in His moral teaching, did not condemn the Scribes and Pharisees for what they had done in this respect, but for their wearing "traditions," which ate out the heart of true religion and accordingly prostituted true Worship. In His own life as a pious Jew, He most carefully observed the Temple Feasts and took His place as a worshipper and expounder in the synagogue of the place where He happened to be. The teaching which He promulgated had as its aim the purification of the then existing W., which was to be preceded by repentance and amendment of life. Above all things He insisted upon that constant and private communion of the soul with God without which there could not be that purity of heart wherewith men shall see God. It is not surprising then that His Apostles should inculcate the same truths and practise that W. of God (through His Son Jesus Christ) which was always in the very forefront of their teaching. The anxiety of St. Paul, when the Euch. W. of the Corinthian Ch. was invaded by worldliness and excess, proves that W. was accepted as a solemn duty by all who professed the Name of Christ.

The teaching of the PB is very clear. Forms of W. are provided for daily MEP, and the direction as to the priest's

2. The PB. duty in that respect is unequivocal (cp. RITUAL B2⁵,⁶). Thus by this rule the Ch. clearly desiderates that a daily stream of W. shall flow to the Divine Throne from her ordained sons at least, and to this there are no admitted exceptions beyond "sickness" or "some other urgent cause." In the matter of exceptions the language of this direction was deliberately strengthened in 1662. But the Ch. is equally solicitous that the lay-folk shall take their place in public W., since "the order for Morning and Evening Prayer (is) daily to be said and used throughout the year." Consequently, provision is made for the regular and consecutive recitation of the Psalter every month, and this course is invaded by special Pss. on only six days in the entire ecclesiastical year. Furthermore, there is a Calendar of Lessons from Holy Scripture for use (a) on Sundays and other Holy Days, and (b) daily throughout the civil year. That is, the PB brings out and emphasises the centralisation of public worship in the united devotions of the community.

But the W. which is most acceptable to Almighty God is surely that which was so plainly commanded by His Son Our Lord,¹

3. The Eucharist. and accordingly the Church is very insistent upon the duty of Euch. Worship. The following facts are of great importance. (1) For every Sunday and Holy Day there has been provided a proper Coll., Ep. and Gospel. (2) A Proper Preface is provided for use on three of the Greater Festivals (Christmas, Easter and Ascension) and likewise for "seven days after," i.e., completing the Octave of these great days; and a similar Preface is given for use on Whitsunday "and six days after" (in that case the Octave is Trinity Sunday, which has its own Proper Preface). (3) The rubric following the Gospel for the Circumcision provides that "the same Coll., Ep. and Gospel shall serve for every day after unto the Epiphany." So the ideal of the Ch. is that the HC should be fully celebrated at least on all the days for which a Proper Coll., Ep. and Gospel are provided (cp. Ac. 20 7). Further, since the only place in the PB where a sermon is to be preached is in the office for HC, it may be reasonably concluded that the Euch. is the service where the Ch. considers that the most part of her people will be gathered together for public Worship. Again, remembering the true liturgical sequence of Sunday morning W., which, beginning with MP (praise and instruction in the Holy Scriptures), passes on to the Lit. ("or General Supplication") and finds its apex in the pure and divine worship of the Euch., it is not difficult to elicit the Ch.'s ideal of the duty of Worship. That this sequence should have become dislocated or obscured is one of the regrets of the present Ch. "revival": that it should be emphasised anew and re-established in its liturgical splendour and simple purity is one of the desiderata of our age.—K3⁴.
